difficulties it was intended to remove. It is, lastly, not possible to provide for everything. The Legislature has wisely rejected the proposal to convert the Code into a Digest of the case-law—a law which is more extensive than the Acts around which it has grown. As, however, the new Code becomes the better understood, a reference to the earlier law which it supersedes will become less and less necessary.

It would, of course, have been possible, as it would have been a lighter task, to have noted selected decisions only. We, however, preferred to give as complete a record of the subject as possible, believing that we should do a greater service by endeavouring to disentangle the confusion of that Record than by following the other course. To master technicality one must be a master of it; a position which can only be obtained by a careful and thorough study of all materials available, whatever value may afterwards, and as a result of such consideration, be attributed to them. We have, however, not considered it necessary to deal with two portions of the Code as we have with the rest. These are O. XXXIV. and the Second Schedule containing the Arbitration Rules. The Order is, with some amendments, substantially a reproduction of former sections of the Transfer of Property Act relating to mortgages. These have been already sufficiently treated of in the able books of Dr. Rash Behary Ghose and Dr. Gour on the subject. The arbitration sections of the former Code have, with some slight alterations, been incorporated in the Second Schedule as a temporary measure only, the Legislature having expressed its intention of shortly dealing with the subject afresh in a separate Act. We have, therefore, in these circumstances, only recorded the cases decided since the date of the last edition of the late Mr. Justice O'Kinealy's Civil Procedure Code.

We have said that the Code is, to a large extent, what it was. At the same time it is to be noted that a considerable number of important amendments have been made which will be found explained in the Commentary. The chief merit of the new Code is that these amendments, and the general scheme of which they form a part, recognize principles which we think make for the effective administration of justice. In this country both the litigants and Courts are apt to attribute excessive importance to what is but the mint, the anise, and the cummin of the law. Procedure is not, as seems sometimes to be supposed, an end in itself, but merely the machinery by which the Court does its work. Nextly, as it is not possible to foresee every contingency which may arise, it is not possible to provide such a machinery as will be effective to meet every want. The terms of the law itself must therefore be flexible, and to the Judges should be given a wide discretion in its administration. Freedom of action, if given, will often enable them to deal justly with cases which the most skilfully constructed provision may fail to meet. The Legislature has recognized that it is not possible to frame a fixed and rigid Code in such a manner as to sufficiently meet the varying needs of an area so diversified as that to which the Code applies. The provisions as to rules enable such variations to be introduced as may be necessary. To the latter are relegated matters of mere machinery. As they now stand they continue substantially, though with important amendments, the former state of things. But the High Courts may add to or alter them as necessity requires. Those provisions only are retained in the body of the Code in which some degree of permanence and uniformity has been considered desirable. In the amendments introduced an endeavour has been made to state general rules of procedure rather than to provide in detail for every possible contingency. The Select Committee very rightly state that they hold it "to be a sound view that excessive elaboration of details of procedure tends to cramp the action of the Court, and in consequence to encourage technicalities." Limitations have in several instances been removed, such as those which existed on the scope of suits (the issues in which, however, are to be clearly defined), the power of remand, powers in second appeal, and so forth. Technical objections to jurisdiction, misjoinder, and the like are sought to be discouraged, and greater powers of amendment are given. A wider discretion is given to the Judges, the Select Committee observing that "the principles of procedure are now so well understood that the Courts may be trusted to apply them intelligently in cases for which no provision may be made in terms." Stuart, C.J., once spoke of those "who refused to know anything about procedure beyond the letter of the Code itself" (5 A. 522). The present Code, on the other hand, recognizes in sect. 152 the inherent jurisdiction of the Court to do what is right where the Legislature has failed to make provision for any particular case which may arise. It will be no longer possible to say that the Court can do nothing, though justice requires it to do something simply because the Code is silent on, or there is no reported decision in which a Judge has had to deal with, the point raised. "Procedure," said Lord Penzance, "is but the machinery of the law after all—the channel and means whereby law is administered and justice reached. It strangely departs from its proper office when, in place of facilitating, it is permitted to obstruct and even extinguish legal rights, and is thus made to govern where it ought to subserve" (L. R. 4 App. Cas 525). It will be well also to bear in mind the dicta of the Judicial Committee that they will look to the essential justice of the case without considering whether matters of form have been strictly attended to (2 M. I. A. 344), and that (6 M. I. A. 410, 411) it is of the utmost importance that the Courts of this country shall constantly bear in mind that by their very constitution they are to decide according to equity and good conscience, and that the substance and merits of the case are to be kept constantly in view.

An Act to consolidate and amend the laws relating to the Procedure of the Courts of Civil Judicature.

WHEREAS it is expedient to consolidate and amend the laws relating to the procedure of the Courts

Previous Legislation Up to the year 1862 the Courts in the Presidency Towns and in the Provinces were governed by different rules of procedure. The Supreme Courts were governed in matters of procedure by their own practice, rules and orders, and certain Acts (1) The Provincial Courts were governed by Acts and Regulations particularly applicable to them (2) In 1859 the first Code of Civil Procedure (Act VIII of 1859) was passed which enacted that where it came into operation the procedure of Civil Courts was to be regulated by it only (3) This Act, however, was originally intended for application in the Courts not established by Royal Charter and it was not till the year 1862 that it was extended to the Courts in the Presidency Towns. In that year the Supreme Courts and the Courts of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in the three Presidency Towns were abolished. Letters Patent constituting the present High Courts were granted in pursuance of an Act of Parliament of the 24th and 25th Vict. c. 104. With the abolition of the Supreme Courts, their former procedure in civil cases between party and party was abolished and by the 37th section of the Letters Patent establishing the High Court at Calcutta, and the corresponding sections of the Letters Patent establishing similar courts at Madras and Bombay, the proceedings in civil suits between party and party brought in the High Courts, were to be regulated by Act VIII of 1859 and by such further or other enactments of the Governor General in Council in relation to Civil Procedure as were in force at the date of the several Charters. Provided always that the regulation of such proceedings respectively should be subject to such laws and regulations as should be thereafter made by the Governor General in Council in relation to such proceedings. This was modified by the 31st sections of the new Charters of 1855, which run as follows: "And we do further ordain that it shall be lawful for the said High Court, &c. from time to time to make rules and orders for the purpose of regulating all proceedings in civil cases which may be brought before the said High Court, including proceedings in its Admiralty, Vice-Admiralty, Intestate and Matrimonial Jurisdictions respectively. Provided always that the said High Court shall be guided in making such rules and orders, as far as possible, by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure being an Act passed by the Governor General in Council and being Act No. VIII of 1859, and the provisions of any law which has been made, amending or altering the same, by competent legislative authority (1) Other Acts relating to the adoption of the Code of 1859 by the High Court are mentioned below (2) The Acts passed after 1859 modifying and amending that Code are given below (3) In 1877 the second Code was enacted (Act X of 1877). This very considerably amended and added to the Code of 1859. Whereas the latter contained 388 sections only, the former contained 652. This Code was followed by amending Acts (4) and then by Act XIV of 1882, which was also repealed in part and amended by subsequent Acts (5).

The present Code repeals that of 1882, as also the preceding Acts VII of 1888, XII of 1891, V of 1894, XIII of 1895. The chief feature of the present Code is the distinction drawn between matters dealt with by the Act viz. those matters which affect more than one Province and matters in which it is essential that there should be uniformity in all Provinces and minor matters which are relegated to a schedule and treated as mere rules which may be varied or amended by the High Courts and Chief Courts. The rules are to a large extent sections of the Code of 1882 amended in certain particulars and added to in other. As regards the body of the Act the greater number of alterations perhaps occur in the provisions relating to execution although a part of the Code has been amended and added to in other respects. The provisions relating to the law have been left unchanged from the Code of 1882. The provisions relating to the subject of the present Act III of 1882, which came into force on the 1st January 1883.

"Consolidate and amend"—The Code is a consolidating Act. The method of construction to be adopted in the case of such a Code has been expounded by Lord Herschell (1) in terms which have been adopted by the Privy Council (2) and cited and applied in other cases in this country (3). Dealing with the English Bills of Exchange Act, which was intended to be a Code of the Law relating to negotiable instruments, he said—

"I think the proper course is in the first instance, to examine the language of the statute and to ask what is its natural meaning, uninfluenced by any consideration derived from the previous state of the law and not to start with inquiring how the law previously stood and then assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, to see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with this view. If a statute intended to embody in a code a particular branch of the law is to be treated in this fashion it appears to me that its utility will be almost entirely destroyed, and the very object with which it was enacted will be frustrated. The purpose of such a statute surely was that, on any point specifically dealt with by it the law should be ascertained by interpreting the language used, instead of as before, by roaming over a vast number of authorities in order to discover what the law was extracting it by a minute critical examination of the prior decisions dependent upon a knowledge of the exact effect even of an obsolete proceeding such as a demurrer to evidence. I am of course, far from asserting that recourse may never be had to the previous state of the law for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the provisions of the Code. If, for example, a provision be of doubtful import, such resort would be perfectly legitimate, or, again, if in a code of the law of negotiable instruments, words be found which have previously acquired a technical meaning or been used in a sense other than their ordinary one in relation to such instruments, the same interpretation might well be put upon them in the Code. I give these as examples merely, they, of course do not exhaust the category. What however, I am venturing to insist upon is that the first step taken should be to interpret the language of the statute, and that an appeal to earlier decisions can only be justified on some special ground" (1)

It has been said that a reference to the previous history of the law and legislation on the subject is one of the means by which a Court is entitled to seek assistance in construing an Act of the Legislature (4). And the practice of the Calcutta, Madras and Bombay High Courts has been to consider as aids towards construction the history of the transition of an Act through the Legislature and to refer to the Reports of Law Commissioners, Proceedings of the Legislative Council, Reports of Select Committees, Draft of Bills and

Statement of Objects and Reasons The Privy Council have, however, in the case of the Administrator-General of Bengal v. Prem Lall Mullick,(1) observed upon the use of these means of interpretation, expressing their disapproval of the practice of referring to the proceedings of the Legislature which result in the passing of an Act. A large number of decisions exist upon this question, which is one of some difficulty.(2)

It is, no doubt, a well-established rule of construction that when the terms of an Act are clear and plain, it is the duty of the Court to give effect to them as they stand, according to their plain meaning, neither adding to, nor subtracting from them. The Legislature must be taken to have intended to mean what it has so plainly expressed, and when the terms of an Act admit of but one meaning a Court is not at liberty to speculate on the intent of the Legislature, or to construe them according to its own notions of the reasons supposed to have been the cause of its enactment (3). The primary question, in short, is not what may be supposed to have been intended, but what has been said (4). Where, however, an Act has been considered not to clearly express the intention of the Legislature, it has for some years been the practice of the Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay High Courts (5) to consider (as aids towards construction): (A) The history of previous Legislation,(6) (B) and of the transition of an Act through the Legislature, viz —

(4) Per Lord Herschell in Brophy v. Attorney General of Manitoba, L. R. (1895) App. Cas. 216.

(5) The Allahabad High Court held, on the other hand, in Kadir Baksh v. Phawani Prasad, 11 A. 145 (1891), dissenting from R. v. Kartick Chunder Das, 14 C. 721, and Hemesh Chunder Sanyal v. Hiru

Hyde, 100, that the meaning of an Act is to be gathered solely by reference to the Act itself and not to any official report of proceedings in the Legislative Council. These two cases are, therefore, in accord with the Privy Council case now considered (Administrator-General of Bengal v. Prem Lall Mullick).

(6) Prabhakarbhattacharya v. Vishwambhar Pandit, 8 B. 313 (1884) [held that the pre-existing state of law, as recognized by the Tribunals, is one of the chief means of interpretation]. In Bahadurunnissa Begum v. Secretary of State, 1886-1889, the High Court (11 C. 67), as well as the Privy Council (17 C. 590), fully reviewed the earlier legislation in order to determine upon the construction of Act IX of 1817. Similarly the Allahabad Full Bench in R. v. Babu Lal, 6 A. 509 (1884), considered the provisions of English law and the

- (c) Reports of Select Committees of the Legislative Council (3)
- (d) Draft stages of a bill, (4) and
- (e) Statements of Objects and Reasons, (5) attached to bills

The question of the right to make use of these aids to construction came before the Privy Council in the case referred to The Calcutta High Court in the previous and subsequent course of legislation in construing Act II of 1874 See also R v Fischer, 14 M 342 (1891), and numerous other cases

(1) Shaik Moosa v Shaik Essa, 8 B 241 (1884), where Sargent, C.J., adopting the view of Lord Westbury in In re Mew, 31 L J Bankruptcy, 87 [where the Lord Chancellor referred to a Report of the Commissioners on Bankruptcy law], held that the Reports of Law Commissioners could be referred to in aid of the construction of a statute. In R v Ghulet, 7 A 44 (1884), Duthoit, J., with the apparent approval of his colleague, Straight, J., referred to such reports. The admissibility of such reference was expressly ruled in Romesh Chunder Sanyal v Hiru Mondal, 17 C 852 (1890). However, in Tarak Nath Sircar v Prosono Coomar Ghose, 19 W R 48, 53 (1873), Couch, C.J., said "You cannot interpret Acts by Reports of Commissioners."

(2) Mathoor Kant Shaw v India General S N Co, 10 C 166 (1883) [reference by Prinsep, J., to speech of member in charge of a bill when moving for leave to bring it in and when introducing a bill], Fadhu Jhala v Gour Mohun Jhala, 19 C 544 (1892) [a speech of a member introducing a bill and assigning its objects and reasons may be looked at], Yesu Ramji Kalnath v Balkrishna, 15 B 583 (1891) [Sargent, C.J., referred to speech of member when presenting Report of Select Committee on bill and moving its consideration], Fadhu Jhala v Gour Mohun Jhala, supra [Prinsep, J., quoted speech of member in charge (Mr Peacock) made even during debate]. But as to speeches of others upon a bill, it has been held by the Bombay High Court in Gopal Krishna Parachure v Sakho Jirav, 18 B 133 (1894), that the debate on the bill, when before the Council, is not to be referred to. However in Chunilal Pansal v Bomant Muncherji Modi, 7 B 310, 315 (1883), Birdwood, J., referred to the speech not only of a member introducing a bill, but of a member speaking upon an amendment, and see also Mahomed Jackariah v Ahmed Mahomed, 15 C 137 (1887). The Allahabad High Court, on the other hand, has held generally that the Courts cannot look to the debates of the Legislature. Kadir Baksh v Bhawan Prasad, 14 A 145 (1892), Maharaj Tewari v Har Charan, 26 A 144, 147 (1903); and see Goundu Pillai v Thayammal, 14 M L J 209 (1904).

(3) R v Kartick Chunder Das, 14 C 721, 728 (1887), Romesh Chunder Sanyal v Hiru Mondal, 17 C 852 (1890), Fadhu Jhala v Gour Mohun Jhala, 19 C 544 (1892), Administrator General v Prem Lal Mullick, 21 C 732 (1894), Yesu Ramji Kalnath v Balkrishna, 15 B 583, 585 (1891), Ramchandra Joishi v Hasi Kassim, 16 M 207, 210, 212 (1892), Mahomed Jackariah v Ahmed Mahomed, 15 C 139 (1887). The Allahabad High Court has, however, held to the contrary that these reports cannot be referred to. Kadir Baksh v Bhawan Prasad, 14 A 145 (1892).

(4) In R v Kartick Chunder Das, 14 C 729 (1887), s. 22 of the Draft Bill on Evidence was referred to, but in Shaik Moosa v Shaik Essa, 8 B 241 (1884), it was held that the Court could not look at the various forms in which a bill was brought before the Legislature.

(5) Fadhu Jhala v Gour Mohun Jhala, 19 C 545 (1892), Administrator General v Prem Lal Mullick, 21 C 732 (1894), Shaik Moosa v Shaik Essa, 8 B 241 (1884). However, in Mathoor Kant Shaw v India General S N Co, 10 C 166 (1883), Prinsep, J., considered it unusual to refer to the Objects and Reasons, though he did in that case read an abstract from the Legal Members speech containing the Objects and Reasons, and in Kadir Baksh v Bhawan Prasad, 14 A 145 (1892), the Allahabad High Court held that the Objects and Reasons attached to a bill could not be referred to.

that case (The Administrator General of Bengal v Prem Lall Mullick), (1) in aid of the construction of Act II of 1874, referred (a) to the course of legislation, (2) (b) the statement of the objects and reasons of the Act, (3) and (c) Report of the Select Committee (4)

The Privy Council, before whom the case came in appeal, (5) held with regard to (a) that (i) "a positive enactment in a statute of 1874 can not be qualified or neutralized by indications of intention gathered from previous legislation upon the same subject And there is no legislation subsequent to that of 1874, with respect to the power of an executor to make over his office with all its rights and liabilities to the Administrator-General, ' (6) and (ii) that it is against reason and authority to maintain the proposition, "that in dealing with a Consolidating Statute, each enactment must be traced to its original source, and when that is discovered, must be construed according to the state of circumstances which existed when it first became law The very object of consolidation is to collect the statutory law bearing upon a particular subject and to bring it down to date, in order that it may form a useful code applicable to the circumstances existing at the time when the Consolidating Act is passed" (7) With regard to (b) and (c), the Privy Council observed as follows —(8) "The two learned Judges who constituted the majority in the Appellate Court, although they do not base their judgments upon them, refer to the proceedings of the Legislature which resulted in the passing of the Act of 1874, as legitimate aids to the construction of sect 31 Their Lordships think it right to express their dissent from that proposition The same reasons which exclude these considerations when the clauses of an Act of the British Legislature are under construction are equally cogent in the case of an Indian Statute"

The question next to be considered is how far, if at all, does this decision of the Privy Council affect the practice of the Indian Courts to which reference has been made The result of their Lordships' decision appears to be as follows —

(i) Pre existing legislation may still be referred to as an aid towards construction, (9) subject to this that (a) if the terms of an Act are clear positive, and express, they cannot be modified or neutralized by indications of intention to be gathered from previous legislation upon the same subject, (b) that in the case of a Consolidating Act, it must be construed not with reference to the circumstances existing at the time of the preceding Acts but in relation to those existing at the time of the Consolidating Act (10) This last dutun it is conceived, refers to cases where the two sets of circumstances differ (1) In all cases, however, the proper course is in the first instance to examine the language of the Act, uninfluenced by considerations as to the previous state of the law, and to resort to a consideration of the latter only if the meaning of the Act itself be not clear

(ii) Reports of the Indian Law Commissioners—These were not referred to in the lower Court, and the Privy Council have said nothing directly as to their use. They have, however, indicated that the law in these matters should be the same as that which prevails in England, and according to this test reference is permissible. See Lord Westbury's view in the case of In re New, cited ante, p 5, n (1) In the case of Chuni Lal Mancharam v Manishankar Atmaram (2) the Bombay High Court in dealing with the Easements Act referred to the recommendations of the Law Commission

(iii) Proceedings of the Legislative Council—Upon a reference to some of the terms of the Privy Council judgment, it would seem that reference to these is not now permissible. But in the case of In re New, (3) the Lord Chancellor read a speech made in the House of Commons by the member who introduced the Bankruptcy Bill of 1860. The Privy Council itself also in Hebbert v Purchas (4) referred to the Commons' and Lords' Journals and to the details of a conference between the two Houses of Parliament. And in the Queen v Bishop of Oxford (5) Bramwell, J, read passages from the Lord Chancellor's speech made in the House of Lords upon the Church Discipline Act. The Bombay High Court has, however, since held that it is not permissible to refer to the speech of the Legal Member of the Indian Legislative Council when proposing the enactment of a bill (6)

(iv) Reports of Select Committees of the Legislative Council—These were referred to by the High Court in The Administrator General v Prem Lal Mullick. The Privy Council must, therefore, it seems be taken to have disapproved of the reference to those reports, though reverting again to the English rule upon which the Privy Council rested their judgment, it appears that Sir George Turner, L J in Drummond v Drummond (7) referred to the proceedings of a Select Committee of which he had been a member. In the case of Assam v Pathunuma (8) the Madras High Court referred to the report of a Select Committee

(v) Draft Stages of a Bill—These were not referred to in the principal case either in the judgments of the High Court or Privy Council. But they appear to fall within the principle of exclusion laid down by the latter, and the rule contended for is not to be found among the previously existing laws. It is sufficient if the provision relied upon is a part of the Act, whatever the description of the purposes of the Act may be. Daimoddu Puk v Kaim Tarilar, 5 C 300 303 (1879)

(1) In the cases of In re New, 31 I J Bankruptcy 87 a Consolidating Act was construed with reference to circumstances existing at the time of the earlier Act where how ever the circumstances had not changed (as it had in the Privy Council case) at the time of the latter Act. See observations in Mad I J supra 289 290

there is but little authority to be found for their use. In Chuni Lal Mancharam v. Manishankar Atmaran (1) the Court referred to the Drafts of the Pensions Bills of 1879 and 1881, as also to the opinions of the draftsman of the first mentioned bill.

(vi) Statements of Objects and Reasons - These were referred to by the High Court in the principal case, and the Privy Council must, therefore, it seems, be taken to have disapproved of their use. The attachment of a statement of objects and reasons to a bill being a procedure peculiar to this country, there is no English authority upon the point. The preamble of an Act, which may be referred to, affords the nearest analogy. But if there be any grounds for the admission of reports of Select Committees or proceedings of the Legislative Council, it certainly seems that strong grounds also exist for the admissibility of these statements. In the case of the Delhi and London Bank v. Hem Lal Dutt (-) Trevelyan, J., referred to the Objects and Reasons of the Pensions Act, for the purpose of seeing what was the law at the time, and in the case of Chuni Lal Mancharam v. Manishankar Atmaran, (3) Candy, J., also referred to the statement of Objects and Reasons.

The Privy Council decision has been shortly referred to by the Calcutta High Court in the case of the Queen Empress v. Sri Churn Churno (4) where Pigot, J. (Prinsep and Macpherson, JJ., concurring) said "We do not propose to consider the history of the Penal Code from its original draft by Lord Macaulay in 1810, to its becoming law in 1860. Their Lordships of the Privy Council, in the recent case of the Administrator General of Bengal v. Prem Lal Mullick, have held that it is not competent to refer to proceedings of the Legislature as legitimate aids to the construction of a law." This decision of the Privy Council was also referred to by the Bombay High Court in R. v. Gangadhar Tilak (5) in which it was broadly stated that it is inadmissible to take as an aid in construing an Act the proceedings in the Legislative Council which resulted in the passing of that Act.

In any case, and whether or not admissible to construe the Acts to which they relate, the Acts of the Legislature are instructive historically, if one has to consider not what the statute says, but what may have been the motives of one or other party in promoting the legislation (6). And there is but little doubt that there will be a continued reference to such Acts, if not as technical aids, at any rate as private aids towards the comprehension of the intention of the Legislature.

The primary question in each case is of course, What are the facts? It is however a common fault in this country to disregard the facts of a case in favour of authorities (7).

The next question is, What are the words of the Code itself?

The Act must be taken as one continuous Code, the different sections being simultaneously enacted in view of each other (1) The Court must be governed by the language of the Legislature without considering what may have been its intention, if the words themselves are clear (2) Its limited function is not to say what the Legislature meant, but to ascertain what the Legislature has said that it meant (3) It is always dangerous to paraphrase an enactment, and not the less so if the enactment is perhaps not altogether happily expressed (4) Where the Code contains provisions upon a particular question, it must be tested, not by general principles but by the expressions of the Code which relate to that question (5) Where two procedures or two remedies are provided, one of them must not be taken as operating in derogation of the other (6) In many cases reference has to be made to judicial precedent. For it is a principle peculiar to the English Common Law (7) that a decided case has an authoritative and binding force and is, subject to certain well-known limitations, to be followed in other similar cases It is, however, an unfortunate circumstance that the greater bulk of the reported Indian cases deal with questions of adjective law, unfortunate because a great divergence of opinion, such as exists touching the interpretation of rules of procedure, limitation, stamp or registration, is to be avoided, involving, as it does, uncertainty in the administration of justice and an encouragement of appeals, which in many cases are due to the hope entertained of overturning the judgments of the lower Courts, not upon the merits, but upon some technicality or other (8)

In this country the use of judicial precedent frequently leads to abuse

Every case is independent of every other, and no decision upon facts forms a precedent for any other decision And every judgment must be read as applicable to the particular facts proved or assumed to be proved, since the generality of the expressions which may be found there are not intended to be expositions of the whole law, but governed and qualified by the particular facts of the case in which such expressions are found A case is only an authority for what it actually decides It cannot be quoted for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it (9) "The only use of authorities or decided cases is the establishment of some principle which the Judge can follow out in deciding

there is but little authority to be found for their use. In Chuni Lal Mancharam v Manishankar Atmaran (1) the Court referred to the Drafts of the Easements Bills of 1879 and 1881, as also to the opinions of the draftsman of the first-mentioned bill.

(vi) Statements of Objects and Reasons - These were referred to by the High Court in the principal case, and the Privy Council must, therefore, it seems, be taken to have disapproved of their use. The attachment of a statement of objects and reasons to a bill being a procedure peculiar to this country, there is no English authority upon the point. The preamble of an Act, which may be referred to, affords the nearest analogy. But if there be any grounds for the admission of reports of Select Committees or proceedings of the Legislative Council, it certainly seems that strong grounds also exist for the admissibility of these statements. The Privy Council decision has been shortly referred to by the Calcutta High Court in the case of the Queen Empress v Sri Churn Churno (4) where Pigot, J (Prinsep and Macpherson, JJ, concurring) said "We do not propose to consider the history of the Penal Code from its original draft by Lord Macaulay in 1840, to its becoming law in 1860. This decision of the Privy Council was also referred to by the Bombay High Court in R v Gangadhar Tilak, (5) in which it was broadly stated that it is inadmissible to take as an aid in construing an Act the proceedings in the Legislative Council which resulted in the passing of that Act.

In any case and whether or not admissible to construe the Acts to which they relate the Acts of the Legislature are instructive historically, if one has to consider not what the statute says, but what may have been the motives of one or other party in promoting the legislation (6). And there is but little doubt that there will be a continued reference to such Acts if not as technical, at any rate as private, aids towards the comprehension of the intention of the Legislature.

The primary question in each case is of course, What are the facts? It is, however, a common fault in this country to disregard the facts of a case in favour of authorities (7).

The next question is, What are the words of the Code itself?

The Act must be taken as one continuous Code, the different sections being simultaneously enacted in view of each other (1) The Court must be governed by the language of the Legislature without considering what may have been its intention, if the words themselves are clear (2) Its limited function is not to say what the Legislature meant, but to ascertain what the Legislature has said that it meant (3) It is always dangerous to paraphrase an enactment, and not the less so if the enactment is perhaps not altogether happily expressed (4) Where the Code contains provisions upon a particular question, it must be tested, not by general principles but by the expressions of the Code which relate to that question (5) Where two procedures or two remedies are provided, one of them must not be taken as operating in derogation of the other (6) In many cases reference has to be made to judicial precedent For it is a principle peculiar to the English Common Law (7) that a decided case has an authoritative and binding force and is, subject to certain well known limitations to be followed in other similar cases It is, however an unfortunate circumstance that the greater bulk of the reported Indian cases deal with questions of adjective law, unfortunate because a great diversity of opinion, such as exists touching the interpretation of rules of procedure, limitation, stamp or registration, is to be avoided involving, as it does, uncertainty in the administration of justice and an encouragement of appeals, which in many cases are due to the hope entertained of overturning the judgments of the lower Courts not upon the merits but upon some technicality or other (8)

In this country the use of judicial precedent frequently leads to abuse

Every case is independent of every other, and no decision upon facts forms a precedent for any other decision And every judgment must be read as applicable to the particular facts proved or assumed to be proved, since the generality of the expressions which may be found there are not intended to be expositions of the whole law but governed and qualified by the particular facts of the case in which such expressions are found A case is only an authority for what it actually decides It cannot be quoted for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it (9) "The only use of authorities or decided cases is the establishment of some principle which the Judge can follow out in deciding the case before him "(1) Lord Mansfield, C J, said, ' It certainly is very hard upon a Judge if a rule which he generally lays down is to be taken up and carried to its full extent This is sometimes done by counsel, who have nothing else to rely upon; but great caution ought to be used by the Court in extending such maxims to cases which the Judge who uttered them never had in contemplation If such is the use to be made of them, I ought to be very cautious how I lay down general maxims from the Bench "(2)

It is well to bear the remarks cited in the last paragraph in mind, though, of course, the nature of procedure law does not always admit of their application In many cases the rules are of an artificial and arbitrary character, though in others, such as those dealing with bar by judgment or by suit and the like, questions of principle are widely involved

As Holloway, J, said, the application to practical life of sound principles presents no more difficulty than that of empirical maxims (or, we may add, case law), based mainly upon a misunderstanding (or lack of understanding) of the great practical jurists, whom all admit to be the only guides (3)

In questions of procedure it is generally important that there should be uniformity of decision, and that existing practice should not be upset, (4) for

"The expressions of every Judge must be taken with reference to the case on which he decides, otherwise the law will get into extreme confusion" Mr Ramanathan, K C, in his speech on behalf of the Ceylon Bar upon the news of the death of Sir John Phear, late Chief Justice of Ceylon, said The so called 'uncertainty of the law' is nothing more than the uncertainty of ill trained Judges as to the true facts of the case and the proper principles of law applicable to it He (Sir John Phear) made the Bar argue cases upon first principles of law Before his advent legal principles were of little avail in the determination of a case unless supported by a judgment of a competent Court here or in England If in arguing an advocate cited a decided case without going into first principles he would say, 'I don't want authorities Let us solve this case even as a mathematician would solve a problem by applying the axioms and propositions we have learned in our books' If they passed on to authorities too speedily he would say 'We do not want authorities just yet, they are only of corroborative value Let us solve the question by the proper application of first principles and then look into authorities to discover whether our conclusions on first principles are corroborated by them' In this way first principles became paramount' (Ceylon Court, April 10, 1905, cor Sir Charles Layard, C J, and Moncrieff, J) in such cases it is often not so much the nature of the rule as the fact that there is a fixed rule which really matters. In Sadasiva Pillai v Ramalinga Pillai, (1) the Privy Council said "The alleged consensus of the Indian Courts being thus established, their Lordships, whatever their opinion upon the construction of this clause might have been, had the question been res integra, do not think it would be right to run counter to so long a course of decision upon what is in fact merely a question of procedure, it being admitted that the plaintiff may assert rights of this nature, if they exist, in a separate suit."

"It is the duty of a Judge not to declare what he considers the law ought to be, but to decide what, according to the best of his judgment, he finds it is; and if he finds a principle laid down upon competent authority it is far better to accept and apply it broadly and honestly, even if he is not in his own mind satisfied with the foundation of the rule, than to attempt to fritter it away in its application to cases which manifestly come within it" (2). The reasons, however, which Judges have assigned for their opinions have not the same degree of authority as the decisions themselves (3). As regards these, if two cases are not to be reconciled, the authority which is at once the more recent and the more consistent with general principles ought to prevail (4). As already stated, if a principle is laid down upon competent authority it is far better to accept and apply it broadly and honestly, even if the Judge is not in his own mind satisfied with the foundation of the rule, than to attempt to fritter it away in its application to cases which manifestly come within it (5). The same rule applies when dealing with the provisions of the Code itself. "We ought not," said Sir Barnes Peacock, C.J., "to fritter away the law by construing words according to a mere technical sense instead of giving them a broad meaning so as to embrace all cases intended by the Legislature to be provided for" (6).

The Courts here must be guided in the first place by the terms of the Code itself, and, secondly, by those decisions of the Indian Courts which interpret the Code and which are binding on them. The Subordinate Courts are bound to follow the rulings of the High Courts, to which they are subject, where there are different rulings of different High Courts, (7) and in the absence of such turbid or doubt cast upon them without very sufficient reason'. And as to overruling a series of precedents, see Prabhakarbhut v Vishwambar, 8 B 313, 317 (1884), Kusum Kumari v Satya Ranjan, 30 C 999, 1003 (1903).

ruling will do well in following the decisions, if any, of other High Courts and Chief Courts in India. As regards the High Courts themselves, Norris, J., sitting on the Original Side of the Court, said with reference to a decision of an Appellate Bench of the same Court, that though he was not prepared to say that he should consider every judgment of an Appellate Bench binding upon him when sitting on the Original Side, yet every such judgment should receive respectful consideration and careful attention and should be followed, unless the Court was very clearly of opinion that the conclusion arrived at was an erroneous one (1). As regards Appellate Benches all are bound by decisions of the Privy Council and by Full Benches of the same Court and if one Appellate Bench differs from a previous decision given by another the matter must be referred for determination of a Full Bench (2). The High Court is, however, not bound by, though it will give respectful consideration to, the decisions of another High Court. As regards other countries, reference may be made to English case law, when in point, as also to the decisions of those countries such as the United States, (3) whose law is derived from a common source with our own. As regards, however, the decisions of the United States Courts, citation should not be generally approved unless where it is shown to be necessary by reason of the novelty of the point involved and the want of Indian or English precedents (4). As regards these latter it has no doubt, been said that "the Code of Civil Procedure does not prevail in England, and we must interpret its terms as best we may without reference to English cases" (5). It is, however, submitted with all respect that this is neither a correct nor useful view of the matter. The Courts in this country can ill afford to disregard the results of the learning and experience of the English Judges. And for the most part they have been glad to avail themselves of both. This has been where either general legal principles are involved—principles of common application in all countries, or in those in which English notions of jurisprudence prevail—or in cases where similar provisions to those prevailing here exist elsewhere, as in the case of many sections of the Code which are based upon or taken from the English rules under the Judicature Act. Where it was argued that an English decision had no application to India, the Privy Council said, that though that case would not be binding as an authority upon a Court in India not administering English law, their Lordships were far from holding that, decided as it was on the application of a maxim expressing a principle recognized by the laws of all civilized countries, it did not afford a rule applicable to circumstances of the same character in India (1) So also, West, J., in delivering the judgment of the Full Bench, (2) dealing with a question arising under sect 622 of the former Code, said "In such a conflict of opinions as has arisen on the subject we are now considering, it may be useful to see how similar questions have been dealt with by the Courts in England Their decisions can, of course, only afford analogies, not precedents, for Courts so differently constituted as those in India, but these analogies point to principles of general application, and thus repay our attentive consideration" As already stated, many of the provisions of the Code are taken from the English Rules and Orders, and there is no reason why the decisions given on those Rules and Orders should not be applicable here, or on such portions of them as are of equal application in this country and in England Where a principle declared in an English decision does not depend on any peculiarity in English law it may be applicable here (3) Again, where a Colonial Legislature has passed an Act in the same terms as an Imperial Statute, and the latter has been authoritatively construed by a Court of Appeal in England, such construction should be adopted by the Courts of the Colony, (1) though, of course, when the Indian Legislature has rejected or declined to follow the law of England upon a particular point the case is altogether different (5)

It cannot, however, be too much insisted upon that procedure is mere machinery Its rules should be observed, but it is to be remembered that those rules exist to enable the Courts, in a settled and convenient manner, to dispense justice Mere technicality is to be avoided therefore as much as possible This does not mean that the provisions of the Code are to be disregarded, but they are to be construed liberally, and if found to have been infringed it must be seen whether such infringement has affected the jurisdiction of the Court or the merits of the case (6) Courts of law should be especially careful in dealing with technical objections to see what effect their decision will have in defeating substantial justice (7) The Court may however find itself constrained to set aside an order on a ground which has unfortunately no relation to the merits of the case, as for want of jurisdiction, even though no objection has been taken by the parties (1) So in the case now cited, (2) the Privy Council said "This objection to the award was apparently not brought to the notice either of the Subordinate Judge or of the High Court. But the statute is there, and the Judges were bound to take judicial notice of it." And the Court is bound to take judicial notice of a change in the Statutory Law while a suit is pending, and a party is not estopped from calling attention to it, since the Court is taken to have known it (3) And though it is exceedingly undesirable that any suit should fail on account of any technical objection, such, for instance, as that of misjoinder, at the same time when the objection is raised at the earliest opportunity, and when serious inconvenience and expense are likely to be caused to the parties, it is impossible for the Courts not to adjudicate upon the objection, and to relieve the parties from it (4) Rules of procedure are, however, mere machinery, the means by which the Courts are enabled to dispense the justice for which they exist. As the Privy Council have said, it is of the utmost importance to the right administration of justice in the Courts of this country that it should be constantly borne in mind by them that by their very constitution they are to decide according to equity and good conscience, and that the substance and merits of the case are to be kept constantly in view (5) Again, Lord Penzance said (6) "Procedure is but the machinery of the law after all—the channel and means whereby law is administered and justice reached. It strangely departs from its proper office when, in place of facilitating, it is permitted to obstruct, and even extinguish, legal rights, and is thus made to govern where it ought to subserve."

The Code is not exhaustive.—The Code is not exhaustive. It is not uncommonly thought that it is sufficient to defeat an application or to reverse an order that no particular section of the Code can be cited as an authority for it. It is true that Strachey, C J, (7) stated that the Code contained the whole law of Civil Procedure. We are not, however, aware of any other authority to this effect, and that observation was not adopted by Bannerjee, J, in the same case, and both in earlier and later cases in the same Court it was held that the Code was not exhaustive (8) The latter view, it is submitted, is undoubtedly the correct one, and is supported by numerous cases to which reference will be made. Indeed, in one of these, Mahmood J, said (9) "I may therefore at the outset state that, according to my view of the rules of construction applicable to statutes like the Civil Procedure Code, the Courts are not to act upon the principle that every procedure is to be taken as prohibited, unless it is expressly provided for by the Code, but on the converse principle that every procedure is to be understood as permissible till it is shown to be prohibited by the law. As a matter of general principle, prohibitions cannot be presumed, and in the present case, therefore, it rests upon the defendants to show that the suit in the form in which it has been brought is prohibited by the rules of procedure applicable to the Courts of Justice in India' (1). This statement, if it is not to be liable to misconception, is in need of explanation and qualification. It is not to be supposed that it was intended to warrant any and every rule of procedure which a Court may arbitrarily choose to devise or to follow. It has been already pointed out (2) that the Code is exhaustive on the matters in respect of which it declares the law, that is on any point specifically dealt with by it, the law must be ascertained by reference to its provisions. The Code, however, is not exhaustive in the sense that for instance, the Evidence Act has been said to be, the second section of which, it has been held, in effect, prohibits the introduction of any kind of evidence not specifically authorized by the Act itself. The Code binds the Court so far as it goes (3). If it prescribes a particular course in a particular case, that course must be taken. If, on the other hand, as in the case of the former section 561 (now omitted), it contains an express prohibition, the latter must be given effect to. Many matters are dealt with under a settled practice (4). But even such a practice however inveterate cannot be legal if it is contrary to an express enactment or is inconsistent with it (5). It was however pointed out by Wilson, J., in the case cited, (6) that if the Court had power before the introduction of the Code

(1) So in Radha Kishen v. Radha Pershad, 18 C 515, 518 (1891), the Court held that in the absence of any provision in the Code directing an application to be made for execution of an entire decree, a second application for execution was not barred. to make an order, and that power is not expressly taken away by the Code, it must remain (1) So it was held in that case, that although Chapter XXVI of the former Code only provided for suits to be brought by a pauper, the Court had yet power to allow a defendant to defend in forma pauperis. So also in a case (2) which dealt with the inquiry into the question of minority, where a suit was brought by a person professing himself to be adult, but denied to be such by the defendant, upon which an issue was raised for trial, the Court pointed out that sect 442 of the former Code did not apply to the case, which was not provided for by the Code. It however referred to the practice which prevailed before the Code was passed, and held that that practice had not been abrogated by any provision in the Code, and must be considered to be in force (3) As regards, therefore, matters not specifically dealt with by the Code, the Courts are empowered to act under and according to their original powers and practice. Cases may, however, arise for which no provision can be found, either in the Code or in previous enactments or practice. As the Code does not affect previously existing powers expressly given and acted upon, neither does it affect the power and duty of the Court to act according to the well known rule (governing alike the rules of substantive and adjective law (4)) in cases where no specific enactment exists, according to justice, equity, and good conscience. The Court has therefore in many cases, where the circumstances require it acted upon the assumption of the possession of an inherent power to do that justice for the administration of which it alone exists (5) So it has been held that or to restore to its files any case which the Court has itself removed therefrom undetermined, as where a case has been struck off under a misapprehension that the parties had settled it (1). It has been held that if sect 206 of that Code did not apply, the Court exercising appellate jurisdiction had an inherent jurisdiction to bring its decrees into accordance with its judgments, (2) and that although sect 463 of that Code applied only to cases where persons have been adjudged lunatics under the statute, and was silent as to persons not so adjudged, the Court would, in the interest of justice (the provisions of Chapter XXXI of the former Code not being exhaustive), appoint guardians ad litem of such persons, and allow them to sue by next friends (3). A Court has inherent jurisdiction to amend the plaint and decree, (4) and to allow a set off of costs against purchase money in a case not provided for by sect 211 of that Code (5). So also it was held that though there was no special provision in the Code enabling the Court to refuse, on the ground of fraud, to confirm a sale, such as there was in the case of irregularity, neither was there any provision declaring that the Court should not have such a power, that there was no necessity for any special provision, and that if a Court were powerless to repress fraud, and was bound to ratify it, "equity and good conscience," the leading principles of administration of the law, are violated, and the Court had inherent jurisdiction to refuse to confirm the sale (6). The Court has an inherent power to prevent an abuse of its processes and is competent to reverse an order made in the absence of the opposite party without service of notice upon him, and which the law directs should be served (7).

What has been said applies generally. Other questions arise in regard to the original side of the High Court, which has inherited all the jurisdiction and powers of the Supreme Court (8). It has been held that the powers of the High Court in its original Civil Jurisdiction are not limited in all cases to those given by the Code, and in many respects its procedure is peculiar to itself (9).

These instances (and there are doubtless others) are sufficient to show, firstly, that the Code is not exhaustive, there being matters with which it does not deal, and that in such cases the Court will, in the absence of any other express provision, exercise that inherent jurisdiction to do such justice between the parties as the nature of the case requires. There are, however, cases in which a question may arise whether the exercise of a power or the right to make an application is derived entirely from express legislation. So the right of appeal must be given by the enacted law, or equivalent authority,(1) and it has been debated whether a question of costs is one of procedure or one affecting vested rights,(2) in which case it was held that the power to award costs was derived entirely from Acts of the Legislature. As pointed out, however, by Sir Barnes Peacock, C J, the laws cannot make express provision against all inconveniences, so that their dispositions shall express all the cases that may possibly happen, and it is therefore the duty of a Judge to apply them, not only to what appears to be regulated by their express provisions, but to all the cases to which a just application of them may be made, and which appear to be comprehended either within the express sense of the law, or within the consequences that may be gathered from it (3). So as is well known, sects 11-14 (formerly 13 and 14), of the Code do not embody the entire rule of res judicata, which as a principle exists independently of the statute enacting it, and indeed, even as regards sect 13 itself (now sect 11), it has been said that it cannot be applied too literally (4). The principle has therefore been applied to cases with which the Code does not expressly deal (5). In the undermentioned case,(6) Blair, J, said that there are cases of misfeasance grosser than anything provided for in the Code, and that he declined to believe that those are cases where a High Court must fold its hands and allow obvious injustice to be done. At the same time, it is well to bear in mind the observations of Sir John Edge, C J, adopted by Sir John Stanley, C J. "Justice, equity, and good conscience," he said, "are captivating terms, and before a Judge applies what may appear to him at first sight to be in accordance with justice, equity, and good conscience, he must be careful to see that his views are based on sound general principles and

And see per Markby, J, in Cumming v Green, 4 B L R App. 75-76 (1870) dealing with the question of appearance. But in this Court the practice, ever since its establishment, appears to have departed in some respects from Act VIII. And see Jointee Chunder v Anundo Lal Doss, 14 W R A O 1 (1865), where the Court held that though there was no power under the Code of 1859 to order parties not on record to pay costs, yet that the High Court had the same equitable jurisdiction in this respect as the Supreme Court had.

the High Court in the exercise of the jurisdiction with which it is invested. It is a well-settled principle, (1) as a rule of law established by the High Court, that the High Court will not interfere with the exercise of jurisdiction by a subordinate Court unless it is shown that the subordinate Court has acted in excess of its jurisdiction and that the jurisdiction which it exercises is outside the proper limits of its jurisdiction. (2) The exercise of jurisdiction by a subordinate Court is a natural consequence of the law which governs it, and the law which governs it is the law which is given to that subordinate Court by the High Court.

It is a well-settled principle that the jurisdiction to act in cases for which the Code provides is a power which is given to the High Court by the Constitution of the Court, and of the statutory rule (1) enjoining them in the exercise of their jurisdiction to act according to justice, equity and good conscience. (2) The exercise of this power is sometimes found to prevail with reference to clause 15 of the High Court Charter Act, 21 & 25 Vict. c. 101 which gives the High Court the power to do with the matter now under discussion. This clause affects the High Court only. To show it gives the power of superintendence over subordinate Courts. This power comes under the head of the appellate jurisdiction of the High Courts. (3) Under clause 21 of the Letters Patent, the law, equity and rule of good conscience to be applied by the High Court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction is the law, equity and rule which the Court in which the proceedings were originally instituted ought to have applied to the case. The proceedings therefore of a subordinate Court are reviewed under sect. 115 (formerly 622) or superintended under clause 15 on the ground that such Court did not comply with the law which governs it. In such cases, therefore, it is necessary to ascertain firstly, what the law is which governed the subordinate Court in the proceedings complained of, and, secondly, to determine whether that law has been given effect to. It is obvious that a superior Court exercises jurisdiction under clause 15 or sect. 115 (formerly 622) only when the Court below has done wrong. Neither provisions apply when the Court below has done right—that is, has acted according to the law which controls it. If a subordinate Court declines jurisdiction because there is no section of the Code which empowers it to act, the High Court must determine whether it had an inherent jurisdiction or not in the matter. If it had, then the High Court interferes because the subordinate Court was bound to act according to justice, equity and good conscience. The subordinate Court has jurisdiction, but declines to exercise it. On this the High Court interferes and compels the subordinate Court to exercise the inherent jurisdiction it has. Clause 15 does not enable the High Court to say, "It is quite true that the lower Court had no power to make the order, but we will . . . The power given by clause 15 is not an original but a superintending power . . . It assumes that the subordinate Court had jurisdiction but has wrongly declined to exercise it . . . If the subordinate Court had jurisdiction it is because of the inherent power and duties cast upon it by the rule which binds it to act in all cases where no specific provision exists according to equity, justice, and good conscience . . . It has been recently held that proceedings on applications for enhancement of rent under sect. 27 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act (Beng. VI of 1908) are judicial proceedings, and the Deputy Commissioners in performance of their duties under that Act are Courts subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court, which has jurisdiction to interfere when the Courts of Collectors have either exceeded, or failed or refused to exercise, the jurisdiction vested in them by that Act (1)

Inherent jurisdiction—The inherent jurisdiction of the Court to which reference has been made in the last paragraph has now been expressly recognized in sect. 151 of the present Code

"The laws"—In the under mentioned case, (2) Stuart, C.J., speaking of this expression as occurring in the Preamble of the preceding Code, observed that it meant all the laws in operation at the time of the passing of the Code including the General Clauses Act of 1868, but, as has been pointed out (3) this is not correct, as the expression must be used with the words "relating to the procedure," etc., and the General Clauses Act cannot be deemed a law "relating to the procedure of the Courts of Civil Judicature"

"Courts of Civil Judicature"—Subject to what is hereinafter stated, the Preamble shows that the Code applies to all Courts of Civil Judicature. Its provisions will therefore govern the procedure of all Civil Courts in British India, subject to the provisions contained in this preliminary portion of the Code and to any other special Act providing a special procedure for proceedings under it. The general power to entertain suits of a Civil nature except suits of which cognizance is barred by any enactment does not include a general power to make declarations (4). The Act applies to suits in the ordinary civil jurisdiction. As to other case, see the following paragraphs—

Special jurisdiction. (a) Insolvency jurisdiction.—In solvency procedure is civil procedure. Insolvency procedure governing the Provincial Courts was formerly dealt with in the Code, but is now the subject of a separate Act (III of 1907). The insolvency law applicable to the Presidency Towns of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, is contained in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 21 (1848). Clause 15 of the Letters Patent 1865 provides that the Insolvent Court in the Presidency Towns shall be held before one of the Judges of the High Court (called the Commissioner in Insolvency), and the High Court and any such Judge thereof shall have and exercise within the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William, and the Presidency of Madras and Bombay respectively, such powers and authorities with respect to original and appellate jurisdiction and otherwise as are constituted by the laws relating to insolvent debtors in India. The Insolvent Court in the Presidency Towns is constituted by a separate Act of Parliament. It is a Civil Court existing for the purpose of giving relief to persons unable to pay their debts. By the Royal Charter Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict c 104), upon the establishment of the High Courts the Supreme Courts were abolished. In 1862 and 1865 Letters Patent were granted. The Insolvent Court was not then merged in the High Court, but continued in existence side by side with the High Court. The appeal to the Supreme Court (Insolvent Act, sect 73) and the power to make rules (ib sect 76), were transferred to the High Court (1). But though the Insolvent Court is a separate tribunal from the High Court it nevertheless stands in such a special relation to the High Court that a limitation or exclusion of the latter's jurisdiction may indirectly limit or exclude its own (2). Sect 5 of the Insolvent Act gives the jurisdiction, which is that of the Supreme Court. Sect 18 of the Letters Patent declares the jurisdiction to be that constituted by the laws relating to Insolvent Debtors in India. But under clause 44 of the Letters Patent this is subject to the Legislative powers of the Indian Government. Therefore when Act V of 1872 declared that the High Court at Bombay had no jurisdiction in Sind it was held that the petition must be dismissed, though the Insolvent was a European British subject (3). But the Supreme Court's jurisdiction was twofold—local as regards the inhabitants of the cities and personal as regards European British subjects residing in any part of the territories subject to the Presidency Governments. So it was held that an European British subject residing in the Bombay Presidency but outside the local limits of the High Court's jurisdiction, was entitled to petition, (4) and that though the personal jurisdiction did not now exist as regards civil actions, it had not been interfered with as regards the Insolvent Court. This would appear also to have been the view of Peacock CJ (5) but not of Markby, J (6) though in the latter case the actual decision was that the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court was limited to the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William that is Bengal proper the petitioner's permanent residence being in the North Western Provinces.

The Insolvent Court is a Civil Court its proceedings are civil proceedings and (as was apparent from Chapter XX of the former Code now repealed) its procedure is Civil Procedure. But under sect 120 nothing in this Code extends or applies to any Judge of a High Court in the exercise of jurisdiction as an Insolvent Court (1) Orders in insolvency are not orders under the Code of Civil Procedure. They are orders under a special law, but they are under a special law in which different procedure is provided (2) Execution is not taken out from this Court as it has no machinery for the purpose. Formerly the Insolvent Court availed itself of the machinery of the Supreme Court as auxiliary to its own. Subject to the provisions of the Charter Act and Letters Patent, the High Court exercises the same jurisdiction, took over all the work, and inherited all the powers that vested in the Supreme Court, whose jurisdiction it superseded. The Insolvency Act, however, has nothing to do with procedure in execution, which is governed by the Civil Procedure Code (3) So although the Insolvent Court determines the substance of the questions relating to the insolvent's estate, the proceedings in execution and the judgment are the High Court's. Thus a judgment entered up under sect. 86 of the Insolvent Act, in the name of the Official Assignee against the insolvent, is entered up in the ordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (4) The Provincial Insolvency Act does not interfere with any right of appeal to the Privy Council which may otherwise exist (5)

(b) Admiralty jurisdiction—The rules regulating Admiralty practice were framed when the Code of 1859 was in force. Rule 54 directs that proceedings not provided for by the rules shall be regulated by the rules and practice of the High Court in suits brought in it in the exercise of its ordinary original civil jurisdiction. The Code applies to proceedings on the Admiralty side of the High Court, sect. 645A of the former Code was held to show that this is so (6) In Vice Admiralty cases, the effect of appearance, the mode of objecting to the jurisdiction, and the mode of questioning the validity of a pleading, (7) the admission of appeals (8) and costs (9) are matters governed by a settled practice under the Code, the Privy Council rules issued under Statute 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 51, having no operation, except in case of suits in rem in which no appearance has been entered, and of other matters to which the Code cannot be applied (10) Though the Admiralty rules do not apparently contemplate a suit in rem and in personam being combined, they do not expressly or by necessary implication forbid it (11) In a case such as an application for consolidation not provided for by either the Rules or the Code, the practice of the Court of Admiralty in England ought to be followed, so far as such practice can be applied to this country by analogy (12)

(c) Testamentary and intestate jurisdiction—The procedure in testamentary and intestate jurisdiction whether in the High Court (1) or Provincial Courts, is governed by the Indian Succession Act (X of 1865), and the Probate and Administration Act (V of 1881), and by these Acts the proceedings in relation to the granting of probate and letters of administration are, except as in those Acts otherwise provided, to be regulated so far as the circumstances of the case will admit, by this Code (2). In any case in which there is contention the proceedings shall take, as nearly as may be the form of a regular suit, according to the provisions of this Code, in which the petitioner for probate or letters of administration, as the case may be is the plaintiff and the person who may have appeared to oppose the grant is the defendant (3). Although a petition before a caveat has been entered is not a suit in the ordinary acceptance of the term sect 647 of the former Code, which provided that the procedure for suits should be followed so far as it could be made applicable in all proceedings other than suits and appeals, made the provisions of the Code applicable to all miscellaneous civil proceedings. Having therefore regard to this section and sects 238-261 of the Succession Act, it has been held that Chapter XXVI of the former Code was applicable to petitions for probate (4). If the provisions of the Code are inconsistent with those of the Probate and Administration Act those of the Code must prevail as it is the later enactment (5).

The Code only applies so far as the circumstances of the case admit, and though generally applicable, the circumstances peculiar to testamentary cases must be considered. So though probate proceedings are generally regulated by the Code it was held in the undermentioned case that the Court was not justified under sect 177 of the former Code (corresponding with O XVI r 20) in deciding against a caveator because he refused to answer a question and in dispensing with proof of the execution of the will though that section would be applicable under proper circumstances (6). So also unless a will is proved in some form no grant of probate can be made merely on the consent of parties. Hence an agreement or compromise as regards the genuineness and due execution

(1) Mr Stokes in his Commentary on the Succession Act expresses an opinion that having regard to the definition of District Judge in s 3 of that Act (and the same definition is repeated in the Probate and Administration Act) as the judge of a principal Civil Court of original jurisdiction this section applies to proceedings of High Courts in their testamentary and intestate jurisdiction and that their proceedings also must be regulated by this Code. cf Umrao Chand v Bindraban Chand 17 A 475 (1890). In re Monohur Mookerjee 5 C 756 (1890). Esoof Hashim Dooply v Fatima Bibee 24 C 30 (1896). Yeshwant v Shankar, 17 B 388 (1892). In re the will of Dawubai 18 B 237 (1893). By the Rules of the Calcutta High Court the procedure in all cases is to be regulated so far as the circumstances of the case admit by the rules of procedure laid down in the Succession Act whether that Act itself applies to the law or not and in cases in which such rules are inapplicable the procedure is to be regulated by this Code, Rule 65 Belchambers, R & O

(d) Matrimonial jurisdiction—In the case of matrimonial causes as regards matters of procedure, all proceedings under the Indian Divorce Act between party and party are subject to the provisions therein contained to be regulated by this Code (2) Thus any question as to the time within which a respondent may file an answer to a petition is to be decided not by the Rules of the English Divorce Court but by the provisions of the Code dealing with written statements (3) But by sect 7 of the Indian Divorce Act, which does not apply to questions of procedure, (4) the Court is enabled to follow the principal rules of the English Divorce Act in all matters which are not expressly dealt with either in the Act itself or in the Code Thus the Court has adopted Rule 158 of the English Rules and ordered a husband to give security for his wife's costs (5) In a recent case in the Bombay High Court where a Parsi had married a Christian in London and had remained there it was held that the jurisdiction was limited to Christian subjects residing within the Presidency (6)

Special Courts (a) Small Cause Courts—See notes to sects 7 and 8, post These are Courts of inferior jurisdiction and when in a Presidency Town are subject to the order and control of the High Court (7)

(b) Mamlatdars' Court—The object of the Mamlatdars Act (Bom, Act III of 1876) was to consolidate and amend the law relating to the powers and procedure of Mamlatdars' Courts The purpose of the Act was temporary only, and chiefly to provide for the cultivation of the land and to prevent breaches of the peace until the Civil Court should determine the rights of the disputants and such being its purpose the procedure provided is of a very summary character (8) These Courts are Civil Courts and subject to the revisional jurisdiction of the High Court (9) The Act however provides a special procedure and there is no indication in it of any intention that the rules of this Code should apply to cases for which the special procedure makes no provision. The provisions of the Code therefore do not apply to such Courts in Bombay (1)

(c) Revenue Court—The term is defined in sect 5 clause (2), post, which see. There is a distinction between Rent Courts and Civil Courts as referred to in the Rent Acts, Civil Courts being Courts exercising all the powers of Civil Courts as distinguished from the Rent Courts, which only exercise powers over suits of a limited class. But a Rent Court is a Civil Court in the sense that it decides civil questions between persons seeking their civil rights (2). It has therefore been a question in certain cases whether Rent Courts being Civil Courts in the latter sense their procedure is, in the absence of any special provision, governed by the Code. The answer to this question is to be determined not so much by an inquiry into the question whether they are Civil Courts, but whether, assuming they are such, the provisions of the Acts constituting those Courts do not exclude the provisions of the Code, in other words are those Acts complete Codes in themselves or are they governed in matters upon which they are silent by the Code? This question, which has arisen with respect to Act XII of 1881 and Act X of 1859 is dealt with post.

In the majority of cases however, no such question can arise as most of the Tenancy Acts make special provision as regards the applicability of the Code to proceedings in Revenue Courts. In the case of Act XVIII of 1881 (Land Revenue Central Provinces) the Code does not of itself apply, but the Chief Commissioner may, with the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council make rules consistent with the Act for regulating the procedure of Revenue Officers in cases for which a procedure is not prescribed by the Act and may by any such rule direct that any provisions of the Code shall apply, with or without modification to all or any classes of cases before Revenue Officers (3).

The Punjab Tenancy Act (XVI of 1887) provides that the Local Government may, with the previous sanction of the Governor General make rules consistent with the Act for regulating the procedure of Revenue Courts in matters under the Act for which a procedure is not prescribed thereby and may by any such rule direct that any provisions of the Code shall apply with or without modification to all or any classes of cases before those Courts. Until rules are made and subject to those rules when made and to the provisions of the Act, the Code shall so far as is applicable apply to all proceedings in Revenue Courts whether before or after decree (4).

The Lower Bengal Rent Act of 1869 now repealed enacted that save as otherwise provided all proceedings under that Act should be regulated by the Code of Civil Procedure (5). Under the provisions of the present Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), the High Court may from time to time, with the approval of the Governor General in Council, make rules consistent with that Act, declaring that any portions of the Code shall not apply to suits between landlord and tenant as such or to any specified classes of such suits, or shall apply to them subject to modifications specified in the rules. Subject to any rules so made, and subject also to the other provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act, this Code shall apply to all such suits (1) Sects 121-127, 129, 305, 320-326 of the former Code and the corresponding sections of the present Code do not apply to suits for the recovery of rent, and special rules of procedure in respect of certain matters are prescribed for such suits (2) No rules have been made by the High Court declaring any portions of the Code inapplicable to suits between landlord and tenant.

The N W P Rent Act (XII of 1881) appears to contain complete rules of procedure upon the trial of rent suits under it, and it was the opinion of Stuart, C J, in the under mentioned case, (3) that it was intended to exclude the provisions of the Code. But it was held by the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in that case, that the Courts of Revenue in the North Western Provinces, in those matters of procedure upon which the Rent Act of these provinces is silent, are governed by the Code, and that therefore the procedure furnished by sects 43 and 373 of the former Code was applicable to suits tried under the N W P Rent Act, 1881 (4). The grounds of that decision which is in fact, based upon the decision of the Privy Council in Nilmoni Singh Deo v Tarannath Mukerjee, (5) is that Revenue Courts are Courts of Civil Judicature within the meaning of the Code, and that unless exempted (which they were not) by the Code itself they would in all matters, except those in which special procedure is provided in the Rent Act, be governed by the law of the Civil Code. The Full Bench decision does not apply where the Act provides a machinery of its own independent of the Civil Procedure Code, as in the case of references of suits to arbitration (6). And though the procedure prescribed by the Code, such as that prescribed by sect 285, of the former and sect 63 of the present Code may be applicable as between Courts of Revenue of different grades, it cannot be applied where the conflict is between a Court of Revenue and a Civil Court (7).

A similar question arose as regards the Bengal Rent Act, X of 1859, which is still in force in certain places. Formerly it was held, following the Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court already referred to, that the

Revenue Courts in those matters of procedure, upon which the Act is silent, are governed by the Code, and that in consequence sect 43 of the former Code applied to a suit instituted under the Rent Act (1) The decision of the Privy Council in a preceding case (2) lends support to this view in so far as it was there held that though there was nothing in the Act which provided for execution beyond the Collectors' jurisdiction, there was nothing in it to forbid the conclusion that such executions were left to the operations of Act XXXIII of 1852 (an Act to facilitate the enforcement of judgments in places beyond the jurisdiction of the Courts pronouncing the same) or the corresponding portion of Act VIII of 1859 (Civil Procedure Code) When a decree for rent, made by a Collector under sect 23, Act X of 1859, is transferred for execution to a Civil Court, no doubt the latter assuming the transfer to have been validly made will act under the procedure which governs it The Privy Council, however, went further and held that the Collector might make the transfer himself under the provisions of the Code which were applicable, there being nothing in the Rent Act to exclude them It has however, subsequently been held, upon the authority of the reasoning in the Full Bench decision in Nagendro Nath Mullick v Mathura Mohun Parhi (3) that Act X of 1859 is a Code complete in itself, and unaffected by the general laws of limitation and that therefore the provisions of this Code do not apply to cases under Act X of 1859 (4) These cases proceed in substance upon certain of the grounds taken in the dissentient judgment in the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court, viz that apart from the question whether Revenue Courts are Civil Courts, and Civil Courts within the meaning of the Code, the enactment of a special procedure in a special Act excluded the supposition that it was intended to import into that Act the provisions of the Code upon matters not dealt with by that Act If it had been so intended it would have been so enacted, as was done in the subsequent Act of 1869 When however an appeal goes from a Collector to a higher Court, the decree which is given on appeal is the decree of a Civil Court, and a second appeal lies to the High Court, according to the same procedure which obtains in respect of second appeals in suits tried in the ordinary Civil Courts (5) In other words, the removal of the matter to a Civil Court brings it under the provisions regulating the procedure of that Court

In the case of a sale held under sect 110 Act X of 1859 it was held that sect 310A, of the former (corresponding to O XXI r 89, of the present) Code, did not apply, as the Code was applicable up to the sale and not after it (6)

Apparently the Code is applicable in cases under the Madras Rent Recovery Act (1) But though sect 43 (O II r 2, of present Code) precludes a landlord from suing for rent not included in a previous suit, this does not preclude him from adopting any other remedy the law gives him to recover his rent, as for instance by distraint under the Rent Recovery Act (2)

The Code saves any law by a Governor or Lieutenant Governor prescribing a special procedure for suits between land holders and their tenants or agents, and gives power to the Local Government to modify the Code in its application to Revenue Courts See sects 4 and 5, post

Judicial discretion—The Code in many of its sections leaves matters dealt with thereby to the discretion of the Court “Discretion when applied to a Court of Law means discretion guided by law It must be governed by rule, and not by humour It must not be arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular” (3) In some sections the word “may” occurs Great misconception is caused by saying that in some cases “may” means “must” It never can mean “must” so long as the English language retains its meaning, but it gives a power, and then it may be a question in what cases, where a Judge has a power given him by the word “may” it becomes his duty to exercise it (4)

Construction of act of Court—The assumption on which all rules of law are founded is that the constituted tribunals are fully competent to carry them out (5) According to the well known rule the Court may presume that judicial and official acts have been regularly performed (6) The rule is to presume that a lower Court has done its duty neglect of duty cannot be assumed at the mere suggestion of an appellant (7) When an act of a Court can be so construed as to have an operation consistently with law, it would be contrary to ordinary rules of construction to attach to it another signification which would altogether destroy its effect (8) Courts, however, should take care that their orders are framed strictly in accordance with the provisions of the law (9) The presumption of regularity is a rebuttable one Irregularity may be shown, and a mistaken petition on the part of a pleader is no ground for the Courts passing an illegal order (10)

Short title, commencement and extent (2) It shall come into force on the first day of January, 1909

(3) This section and sections 157 to 158 extend to the whole of British India the rest of the Code extends to the whole of British India except the Scheduled Districts

Local Extent (a) British India—These words exclude the territories of Native Princes and States in alliance with His Majesty, the relation between such Princes and His Majesty being a political relation and the territories of such Princes and States forming no part of the British Dominions although in a political point of view such Princes and States may be subordinate to the British Crown as the Paramount Power (1) They were formerly declared (2) to mean the territories for the time being vested in Her Majesty by the Statute 21 & 22 Vict c 106 (1858), other than the settlement of Prince of Wales' Island (Penang) Singapore and Malacca, and the first section of the statute there referred to vested in Her Majesty all territories then in the possession or under the Governments of the East India Company, and all territories which might become vested in Her Majesty by virtue of the rights transferred to Her Majesty from the East India Company Apparently any new province acquired would become on its acquisition, part of British India (3) Cession of territory confers local jurisdiction (4) The term includes territories ceded "in full sovereignty" or "in perpetuity" there being no difference between the two (5) Prior to the General Clauses Act 1897, it was held not to include cases where as in the case of the British cantonment of Secunderabad, there has been no actual cession of territory, (6) nor in the case of Raj Kot, where the agreement between Government and the Native State, although in different respects dealing with the use of the land and conferring certain powers and jurisdictions on the officers of Government, did not relate to the sovereignty of the land, (7) nor as in the case of the Berars, where

land was held under a sort of mortgage as a security for the fulfilment of certain engagements, which was held to be a tenure distinguishable from that on which the Crown held land assigned to it in perpetuity for the purpose of establishing a British station (1) The definition of the words given in the present General Clauses Act (X of 1897) is wider than that given in the former Act of 1868 The expression "British India" is now defined to mean "all territories and places within Her Majesty's dominions which are for the time being governed by Her Majesty through the Governor General of India or through any Governor or other officer subordinate to the Governor General of India" The effect of this altered definition is to widen the extent of what will be recognized as British India for the purposes of Indian legislation and to avoid the difficulties which arose from its restriction to the territories vested in Her Majesty by the Statute 21 & 22 Vict c 106 The question of the extent of British India will now, under the Code as well as under most other Acts, depend on the fact of the place or territory being governed by His Majesty without regard to the manner in which this government was acquired, and the result being the same whether it was acquired by cession or otherwise, and permanently or temporarily (2) From the first and under both definitions, the words "British India" have had a wider meaning than is understood by the term when used in its merely geographical sense, as appears from the Scheduled Districts Acts, 1874, and the Laws Local Extent Act 1874, the Schedules annexed to which mention amongst other places the Laccadive and Nicobar Islands and Aden as parts of British India (3) So also British Burma is a part of British India (4)

(b) Scheduled Districts—The term is defined in Act XIV of 1874 to mean the territories mentioned in the first schedule thereto annexed and also any other territory to which the Secretary of State for India, by resolution in Council, may declare the provisions of 33 Vict c 43 s 1, to be applicable The conclusion that a district is a non regulation district does not necessarily lead to the inference that the general Acts of Legislature are there inoperative If the Legislature has made the law in terms large enough to extend to the whole of the British territories in India it must have full effect It must be seen in each case in what terms the law is expressed especially in respect of its territorial operation (5)

(a) any adjudication from which an appeal lies as an appeal from an order, or

(b) any order of dismissal for default.

Explanation—A decree is preliminary when further proceedings have to be taken before the suit can be completely disposed of. It is final when such adjudication completely disposes of the suit. It may be partly preliminary and partly final.

(3) “decree holder” means any person in whose favour a decree has been passed or an order capable of execution has been made :

(4) “district” means the local limits of the jurisdiction of a principal Civil Court of original jurisdiction (hereinafter called a “District Court”), and includes the local limits of the ordinary original civil jurisdiction of a High Court.

(5) “foreign Court” means a Court situate beyond the limits of British India which has no authority in British India and is not established or continued by the Governor General in Council.

(6) “foreign judgment” means the judgment of a foreign Court.

(7) “Government Pleader” includes any officer appointed by the Local Government to perform all or any of the functions expressly imposed by this Code on the Government Pleader and also any pleader acting under the directions of the Government Pleader.

(8) “Judge” means the presiding officer of a Civil Court.

(9) “judgment” means the statement given by the Judge of the grounds of a decree or order.

(10) “judgment debtor” means any person against whom a decree has been passed or an order capable of execution has been made.

(11) “legal representative” means a person who in law represents the estate of a deceased person, and includes any person who intermeddles with the estate of the deceased and where a party sues or is sued in a representative character the person on whom the estate devolves on the death of the party so suing or sued.

(12) “mesne profits” of property means those profits which the person in wrongful possession of such property actually received or might with ordinary diligence have received therefrom, together with interest on such profits, but shall not include profits due to improvements made by the person in wrongful possession :

(13) "moveable property" includes growing crops :

(14) "order" means the formal expression of any decision of a Civil Court which is not a decree

(15) "pleader" means any person entitled to appear and plead for another in Court, and includes an advocate, a vakil and an attorney of a High Court

(16) "prescribed" means prescribed by rules

(17) "public officer" means a person falling under any of the following descriptions (namely) —

(a) every Judge ,

(b) every member of the Indian Civil Service ;

(c) every commissioned or gazetted officer in the military or naval forces of His Majesty, including His Majesty's Indian Marine Service, while serving under the Government ,

(d) every officer of a Court of Justice whose duty it is, as such officer, to investigate or report on any matter of law or fact, or to make, authenticate or keep any document, or to take charge or dispose of any property, or to execute any judicial process, or to administer any oath, or to interpret, or to preserve order, in the Court, and every person especially authorized by a Court of Justice to perform any of such duties ,

(e) every person who holds any office by virtue of which he is empowered to place or keep any person in confinement ,

(f) every officer of the Government whose duty it is, as such officer, to prevent offences, to give information of offences, to bring offenders to justice, or to protect the public health, safety or convenience ,

(g) every officer whose duty it is, as such officer, to take, receive, keep or expend any property on behalf of the Government, or to make any survey, assessment or contract on behalf of the Government, or to execute any revenue-process, or to investigate, or to report on, any matter affecting the pecuniary interests of the Government, or to make, authenticate or keep any document relating to the pecuniary interests of the Government, or to prevent the infraction of any law for the protection of the pecuniary interests of the Government ; and

(h) every officer in the service or pay of the Government, or remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty

(18) "rules" means rules and forms contained in the First Schedule or made under section 1²² or section 1²⁵.

(19) "share in a corporation" shall be deemed to include stock, debenture stock, debentures or bonds. and

(20) "signed," save in the case of a judgment or decree, includes stamped.

"Code"—See as to Rules, sects 121-131.

"Decree"—The term was first defined in the Code of 1877 to mean "the formal order of the Court in which the result of the decision of the suit or other judicial proceeding is embodied. This definition which was found defective received, after several modifications the form in which it was enacted in 1882. The present Code omits the words "upon any right claimed or defence set up in a Civil Court, substituting the words "which conclusively determines the rights," etc. As regards cases decided under the law prior to 1882 it was observed that the law has been altered by the introduction of a more comprehensive definition of the term decree (1) and that a narrow construction should not be placed upon the language of sect 2 (2). But it has been held by the Privy Council the question whether an adjudication is an order or decree is to be tested not by general principles but by the expressions of the Code and those words are to be construed in their plain and obvious sense (3). Thus it has recently been held that an order assessing no value, but only reproducing the statements of the decree holder and judgment debtor, (4) and an order assessing the value according to the statement of the decree holder alone, after rejecting the judgment debtor's application for time to prove a higher value, are not decrees, since they do not involve a judicial adjudication of value (5). There has been a considerable conflict of decisions on the former section notably as to the question as to the meaning of the term "right" employed in the section, as will be seen from the following notes. The chief importance of the definition will be found in the question whether in any particular case an appeal lies. A decree though not according to law if not appealed against is binding (6) between the parties whether principal or pro forma (7) and their representatives who, after decree cannot open up the original proceedings (8). It creates an obligation superseding that existing before it (9) which is enforceable so long

therefore appealable as a decree (1) These decisions have now been recognised and the section expressly includes a preliminary decree

An order, however, passed in a suit for partition, subsequently to the preliminary decree, appointing a commission to make the partition, is not an order in execution, and, therefore, is not appealable under sect 244 (now sect 47) of the Code It is an interlocutory order pending the suit which has not been finally decided, and the appellant may take objection to it in an appeal against the final decree (2)

An order directing accounts (see O XX r 16) was not appealable by the Codes of 1859 or 1877 It was only when the amending Act of 1879 was passed declaring that such an order came within the definition of a decree that it became appealable, (3) and it is still within the definition as a preliminary decree The definition of "decree" implies that an order directing accounts is separable from the rest of the decree adjudicating on the rights claimed or the defences set up in the suit, and therefore though a provisional decree, is appealable (4) An order determining that a certain person is a partner, settling the shares of each of the partners in a business and directing an account to be taken, is a decree and is appealable, and was held to be so appealable in a preliminary stage or when appealing from the final decree (5) But where in a decree to take accounts an order was made which was a mere matter of procedure and not a question as to the rights of the parties, such as an order refusing to require the defendants to give inspection of certain books, the order was held not to be a decree or an order on a question relating to the execution of a decree (6) Moreover, the words "directing an account to be taken" were held to be used in a precise and technical sense (7) Accordingly an order declaring that the defendants were liable to pay such sum as the Government Surveyor might certify was held not to be a decree as it neither came within these words nor was an adjudication which decided the suit (8) The substitution of the words "enclinedly determines" for "decides" does not appear to effect any change in the law as above stated

'The rights of the parties —The last Code used the words "right claimed or defence set up" There can, we think, be little doubt that what the Legislature originally meant by these words to refer to, were rights of a substantive as distinguished from rights of a merely processual character. In other words, that a decree was, so far as the right claimed, an adjudication on the merits (that is, the right to recover land, money, etc., claimed in the suit), and so far as the defence set up, an adjudication on the defence which might be grounded either on the merits, using that term in its generally accepted sense, or on some point of law affecting the merits, such as limitation. The contrary construction (1) namely, that the right might be one merely of procedure appeared to be negatived both by the general language of the section and by the circumstance that if it were correct there could not be any occasion for specifically making an order rejecting a plaint, a decree, as such an order directly involves an adjudication against the plaintiff's right to proceed with the suit as brought by him (2)

The view here contended for has been expressly adopted or applied in several cases. In an early case Wilson and Field, JJ., were disposed to hold that a decree must be an expression of opinion upon the rights of the parties, and therefore the dismissal of a suit on a ground wholly apart from the merits of the case, such as a dismissal under sect 97 (now O IX r 2) for non service of summons, was not a decree (3). It has been held that a decision under sect 5 of the Court Fees Act is not a decree, and that the right obtained or defence set up must be a right or defence set up in the suit or appeal, and not a right to have the suit or appeal heard on a particular stamp or the plaint or the memorandum of appeal rejected on account of the stamp (4). Similarly it has been held by the Allahabad High Court, (5) and was formerly held by the Calcutta High Court, (6) that the order of dismissal of an appeal under sect 556 (now O XII r 17) is not a decree. It was observed by the Court in the first of the Calcutta cases cited that such an order was not "the formal expression of an adjudication upon a right claimed," that through the default the appellant had rather lost his right to obtain the adjudication of his right claimed in the proceedings or suit; that the mere right to be heard did not come within the definition of a decree. It was, however, held by one of the Judges of the Bombay High Court, (1) and more recently by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court (2) (Pinscp, J, dissenting), that such an order is a decree on the ground as stated by the Bombay High Court that it is an adjudication adverse to the appellant's right to have his appeal heard and it decides the appeal. In the last case it was argued with, as it is submitted, considerable force that the word "right" means a substantial right arising out of the merits of the case, that the juxtaposition of the words "right claimed" and "defence set up" showed that the right asserted or sought to be enforced meant the right asserted or sought to be enforced in the suit or appeal. It must have some connection with the relief sought, and therefore with the merits of the case, and does not connote the processual right of a party to be heard, which is ancillary to the enforcement of the substantive right claimed in the suit or appeal itself. It was further argued that the words "defence set up" cannot mean the mere opposition by a defendant or respondent to his adversary being heard, but must mean an answer to the relief sought. There must be an adjudication of right, and in the case of a dismissal for default the Court declines to adjudicate and does not enter into the merits of the case. These contentions were overruled by the majority of the Court (3). Previously, moreover, it had been held by the Calcutta (4) the Allahabad (5) and Madras (6) High Courts, that the analogous case of the dismissal of a suit under sect 102 (now O IX r 8) was not a decree. On the other hand, it has been held that an order under sect 381 (now O XXV r 2), dismissing a suit for failure to furnish security for costs, is a decree notwithstanding that the right adjudicated upon in the order under sect 381 is the plaintiff's right to sue and not the right which he claims in the suit (7). On the other hand, an order rejecting an appeal under sect 549 (now O XLI r 10) for failure to furnish security has been held not to be a decree, (8) the Court observing that the adjudication must be on a right

(3) The grounds given by the referring judgment were that the order was the expression of an adjudication which was formal, and which decided the appeal. The question, however, remains was it a formal decisive adjudication of a "right" in the sense in which that word is used in the section? See pp 488, 489, 7 C W N

(4) Amrito Lal Mukherjee v Ram Chandra Roy, 29 C 60 (1901), it may, however, be contended that, as this case appears to have proceeded upon the two cases overruled by the last mentioned Full Bench case, it also is impliedly dissented from. claimed or defence set up. And it has recently been held by the Calcutta High Court that an order for security in stay of execution is not a decree within the meaning of this section because it does not determine the rights of the parties (1). It has also been held that an order rejecting an application for permission to sue as a pauper and striking the case off the Court's file was a decree, as the matter disposed of was in fact whether the plaintiff had a right to institute the suit, and the effect of the order was to negative that right and to strike the case off the file (2). Here again the matter has been subject of dissent, it being subsequently held that no appeal will lie from an order rejecting an application for leave to appeal in forma pauperis, the ground being that it was not an adjudication deciding a right claimed in a suit (3). On the other hand, an order made under sect 366 (now O XXII r 3) that a suit do abate has been held to be virtually a decree, though it is a question to be determined before the suit or appeal is heard on the merits, on the ground that it disposes of the plaintiff's claim as completely as if the suit had been dismissed (4). This decision again has been dissented from by the Allahabad High Court (5). The Allahabad High Court has in one case (6) held that an order giving leave to withdraw a suit under sect 373, or 373 and 582 (now O XXIII r 1, and sect 107), is a decree, but subsequently that Court (7) and the Bombay (8) and Calcutta (9) High Courts have held that such an order is not a decree on the ground that it does not express any adjudication on the thing claimed, but leaves all issues in the suit undetermined and relegates the parties to the position they occupied before the suit was filed. Where the Appellate Court passed an order directing the case to be sent back to the original Court, with orders to pass a formal decree in accordance with the award of an arbitrator, it was held that the order was a decree as the matter was before the Appellate Court on the merits and the order was intended to finally dispose of the matter (10). In the under-mentioned case a person claimed to appear in a suit as guardian. The Court decided that he had not got that right, and it was held, per Tyrrell, J., that that order decided his position in the suit, that the order was a decree and that an appeal might have been preferred (1) In a recent case in the Bombay High Court it was said that in applying this definition of decree it will be found that in the reported cases in that Court the rights of the parties with regard to the matter in controversy have been taken to mean general rights (such as rights in relation to status, jurisdiction, limitation and frame of suit) which if decided must have a general effect on the proceedings (2)

Where the plaintiff failed to reply to interrogatories and the Court dismissed the suit under sect 136 (now O XI r 21), it was contended that the order of dismissal was not a decree as it did not adjudicate on the merits of the right claimed. But this contention was overruled and the view adopted that when the procedure of the Court finally disposes of the suit it is a decree (3)

It was observed by Sargent, C J, in dealing with the objection that the order did not adjudicate on the merits of the right claimed, that having regard to the numerous authorities the other way (namely, those treating as decrees orders not dealing with the merits), it was too late to re open the question, although had it been res integra it must be admitted that there was force in the argument based on the words of the section and also on the circumstance of there being a special provision for an order rejecting the suit, and that where the procedure of the Court finally disposes of the suit it is a decree (4)

It appears to be advisable to adopt an interpretation which affords a ready test to distinguish between decrees on the merits and merely processual orders. If this is not done each case must be more or less empirically decided as and when it arises and on its peculiar circumstances. In such case the general test would appear to be—"does the order finally dispose of the suit?" It may be noted in this connection that in the report of the Select Committee (March 12, 1903) on the Bill introduced in December, 1901, the Committee stated that they omitted the words restricting "decree" to adjudications "upon the merits," as was proposed to be done because they might be held to exclude final decisions given wholly upon questions of law. But as to this it is perhaps sufficient to point out that while a claim with merits in its popular sense can be defeated by a defence based upon a point of law, such as limitation, it can only succeed by virtue of a favourable adjudication on the merits. The section, however, has since been expressly amended so as to exclude any order of dismissal for default. This appears to indicate that the "rights of the parties" referred to do not include mere processual rights, and that to constitute a decree there must be an expression of opinion on the rights of the parties in the sense of an opinion upon the merits of the case, that is on the right asserted in the suit or upon the defence whether of law or fact, set up to defend such alleged right. Moreover, a dismissal for default does not "conclusively determine" the right of the party against whom it is passed.

"Civil Court"—In the corresponding definition in Act X of 1877, the word "civil," which was introduced in the last Code, found no place. It has been held that a Civil Court does not include a Revenue Court in the N W P, and the term "decree" in this Code does not include the decree of such a Court (1) Though the words "Civil Court" have been now omitted, probably as unnecessary, the definition of course only applies to such Courts

"In the suit."—Where there is no civil suit there is no decree, and in consequence no appeal (2) No doubt there is authority for the view that the term "suit" is a very extensive one, (3) but the term ought to be confined to such proceedings as under that description are directly dealt with by the Code, or such as by the operation of the particular Acts which regulate them are treated as suits (4) The term "suit" has not been defined for the purposes of the Code (5) The conjunction of the words "suit or appeal" in the last Code appeared to show that appeals, which are often considered a stage of the suit, are not to be deemed to fall within it The section now refers to suit only The word is wide enough to cover every proceeding, whether original or appellate, terminable in such an adjudication (as is referred to in the first part of the clause), under this Code

The particular orders mentioned in the second clause of the last Code as constituting a decree did so by way of addition and exception to the general definition of that term in the first clause (6) This, as has been pointed out, (7) is particularly evident from the mention of orders passed in execution proceedings under sect 211 of the last Code as they cannot be said in any sense to finally decide the suit or appeal, though an order rejecting a plaint may be said to finally determine, so far as the Court which makes the order is concerned, that the suit as brought will not lie, and may have been made a decree on that ground (8) The enumeration of orders was held to be exhaustive, and not merely illustrative or explanatory (9) Though it cannot be said that the rule was always strictly observed (vide post), analogy could not extend the term to any orders other than, though like, those specifically mentioned

Rejection of a plaint—An order rejecting a plaint is a decree, whatever may be the grounds, or absence of grounds, for that order. In every case an order falling within sect 54 (now O VII r 11) is a decree (9). The words are, however, not limited to the cases provided for in sects 53 and 54 (now O VI r 17, O VII r 11), post (10). Nor does it make any difference that the rejection may be due to a misapplication of the rules of the Code or practice (11). So not only is an order rejecting a plaint on the ground that it is insufficiently stamped (12) a decree, but also an order given on the ground that the plaintiffs are minors (13). And orders which are substantially in effect orders rejecting plaints have been held to be decrees, as an order returning a plaint for including causes of action which could not be joined without leave of the Court, (14) or an order under sect 331 (now O XXI r 99) refusing to number and register a claim as a suit, which is of the same effect as a refusal to register a plaint, or which, in other words, amounts to the rejection of a plaint (1) An order refusing to entertain a suit because the section of the law to which it related was not cited in the plaint, was held under the Code of 1859 to be a judgment. The Court pointed out that such an order ought to state whether the suit was dismissed or the plaint rejected, and under what sections respectively (2) An order rejecting an appeal stands on the same footing. An order rejecting a plaint is a decree, and by sect 532 (now O XXXVII r 2) of the Code the provisions thereinbefore contained are made to apply to appeals, so far as such provisions are applicable. An order therefore rejecting or dismissing an appeal is a decree of the Appellate Court under the terms of the definition (3) In the Code there is no separate provision which allows the Appellate Court to "reject" a memorandum of appeal on the ground of its being barred by limitation. Sect 543 (now O XLI r 3) is limited to cases in which the memorandum is not drawn up in the manner prescribed by the Code, and it is only by applying sect 54 (c) (now O VII r 11), mutatis mutandis (as provided by sect 582, now sect 107, O XXII r 11) to appeals that the Code can be understood to make provision for rejection of appeals as barred by limitation. Sect 4 of the Limitation Act says that the appeal shall be dismissed. It is clear therefore that such an order of dismissal is a decree as it disposes of the appeal (4) So an order dismissing an appeal as being presented out of time, (5) rejecting an appeal as not duly presented the vakalatnamah being executed in favour of two vakils but accepted only by one, (6) or for deficiency of court fee, (7) an order rejecting a memorandum of appeal on the ground that it contained language disrespectful to the Court of first instance, (8) have been held to be decrees. On the other hand, it has been held that an order returning a memorandum of appeal on the ground that the value of the suit was beyond the pecuniary limits of the Court's jurisdiction is not a decree as it did not decide but refused to decide the appeal (9) And an order returning a plaint for presentation to the proper Court is not a decree (10) Where there is no appeal and no appellate decree there can be no second appeal. Where an appeal petition having been presented bearing

—These are orders of the Court executing a decree determining any question relating to the execution discharge or satisfaction of the decree, provided that these questions arise between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed or their representatives, and orders for restitution upon the variance or reversal of a decree. It is stated that the word "within" has been substituted for "mentioned or referred to in" with a view to bringing within the definition of decree orders against sureties (see sect 145) and orders as to Court fees in pauper suits (see O XXXIII r 13), and thus providing for appeals therefrom. It has been recently held that an order on an application under O XXXIII r 13 for payment under O XXXIV r 10 or 11 is an order under sect 47 and appealable accordingly (2)

The Privy Council (3) and the Courts in India (4) have held that a narrow construction is not to be placed upon the language of sect 47 (formerly sect 244). The object of that section is that the Court having the parties already before it should decide all questions relating to execution, etc arising between them in place of allowing one or the other of them to put his adversary to the delay and cost of a separate suit in cases in which but for this section it might be possible for him to do. In order to affect this object completely without injustice to the parties an order under this section has been included within the definition of 'decree' so as to allow an appeal (5). It is of the utmost importance that all objections to execution sales should be disposed of as cheaply and as speedily as possible (6). If where a proceeding is sought to be set aside, that proceeding is one which relates to execution, and if the contest as to its validity is between the parties to the suit the specific ground on which the proceeding is impeached, whether it be fraud in the execution proceedings or other ground, is not material within the meaning of sect 47 (7). The expression 'relating to execution' etc in sect 47, is wide and somewhat vague though perhaps necessarily so and has caused some difficulty in several cases, but once a case is held to come within these words, the law seems plain enough (8). The matter must be determined by an order under sect 47 and not by separate suit and such an order is a decree and is such appealable.

It was not, however, the intention of the Legislature to render all orders (irrespective of their nature) made in relation to the execution of a decree

Under the 1st Code it was held that the definition of "order," given in sub clause 11, could not be used for the purpose of defining the word 'order' in the previous part of the section, because it expressly excluded everything in that part (1)

Preliminary decree—See note on "Conclusively determines"

"Dismissal for default"—See note on "The rights of the parties"

"Decree-holder" and "judgment debtor"—The second term means only any person against whom an order has been made and there is now a reference in the definition to the order being capable of execution. The transfer of a judgment-debtor's liability is not recognized, except to a very limited extent in case of his death to his legal representative (see sect 50 formerly sect 231 pro 1). On the other hand a decree-holder may assign his right under the decree or such transfer may be affected by operation of law. The words 'and includes any person to whom such decree or order is transferred' have now been omitted. It was held with regard to the former definition that it must not be applied where it was repugnant to the context. The only rule it was held which would harmonize this section and the provisions relating to the execution of assigned decrees was that in an assignee under an oral assignment has, as such, no locus standi at all to apply for execution but that as regards an assignee in writing or by operation of law the Court has a discretion whether to recognize such assignment or not (2). The definition was held to include a person to whom a share of a decree is transferred (3). Notwithstanding the omission the law is now the same. The representative of a judgment debtor was held to be a judgment debtor within the meaning of sect 258, now O XXI r 2, post (4).

Under the General Clauses Act (5) the word 'person' unless there is anything repugnant in the context, includes "any company or association or body of individuals, whether incorporated or not." In Admiralty proceedings in rem a vessel is deemed invested with a personality, and the expression 'defendant' in O I r 3 and 4 (formerly sect 28), post, includes a vessel (6). And if a vessel can be a defendant, it may be a judgment debtor.

"District Court"—This section is one of those which, by sect 1 are excluded from consideration when dealing with a question in a Scheduled District (7) to which the Code has not been extended. In some of the districts the District Judge is designated Deputy Commissioner but in Chota Nagpur the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, and not that of a Deputy Commissioner, is the Principal Civil Court of original jurisdiction and therefore the District Court (8). In the other provinces the Court of the "Foreign Court." "Foreign judgment." The words Court and Foreign judgment in Penal India were inserted to exclude the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from the definition. The other English Courts are, with regard to the Courts in India, as much Foreign Courts as the Courts of France or of any other foreign country (2). Such are the Courts in the Native States in India (3) in Ceylon and the Colonies. As to the Courts situate beyond the limits of British India and established by the Governor-General in Council, see sect. 17, post. On account of the extension in the definition of "British India," the number of such Courts will not be so large as before, but the Courts in Residency, Buzurgs and in British cantonments in Native States will afford the most ordinary instances of Courts which though outside British India are not foreign Courts (4). This definition of "Foreign Court" is for the purpose of this Code only, and does not avail to extend the jurisdiction of the High Court so as to enable it to restrain suits pending in Courts which are outside its jurisdiction under the Charter (5). As to foreign judgments, see sects. 13-14, post.

"Government pleader." See O XXXIII rr. 6-7-9, and O XXVII rr. 1-5-6-8, post, which deal with functions imposed by the Code on Government Pleaders. As to the definition of "Local Government," see sect. 3 (29), Act X of 1867. The words italicized have been added to meet a practical difficulty said to have been experienced on occasions when it is necessary for the Government Pleader to appoint another pleader to conduct the case.

"Judge." This definition is different from that contained in sect. 19 of the Penal Code, as the requirements of the Civil and Criminal law are distinct. "Officer," of course, includes "officers," as in the case of two or more Judges constituting a Bench. The term "Court" is not defined (6). Where a Court is composed of more than one officer, each doing separate work allotted to him by the Chief Judge, each officer is individually a Judge, and must be deemed to be a presiding officer of a separate Court (1) As regards the appointment, disqualification, and jurisdiction of Judges, see notes to sect 9, post

"Judgment"—The term has here a different signification to that it possesses in English law, in which it is used in the sense attached to the term "decree" under the Code Under the former practice it was restricted to a decision of the Common Law Courts, the term "decree" being used in the Court of Chancery This distinction is, however, now abolished, the expression "judgment" being generally used, except in matrimonial causes, in which the term "decree" is still retained (2) The judgment must be based on relevant facts duly proved before the Court, and a Judge should not therefore import into a case his own knowledge of particular facts (3) and it must be founded on a case either to be found in the pleadings or involved in or consistent with the case thereby made (4) A Judge may, however, consult other Judges before whom the trial is not held (5)

Excessive elaboration tends to impair the value of a judgment by defeating its proper object, which is to support by the most cogent reasons that suggest themselves the final conclusions at which the Judge has conscientiously arrived The Privy Council therefore on these grounds adversely criticized a judgment of a voluminous character recording the fluctuations of the Judge's mind from day to day in the course of an exceptionally long trial, and the effect (often temporary upon him) of a particular piece of evidence or argument of counsel since from such a mass of often conflicting statements it is not easy for a Court of Appeal to extract the precise grounds on which the final conclusion rests (6) Moreover it is a substantial objection to a judgment that it does not dispose of the question as it was presented by the parties, e.g., where it finds a particular signature to be a forgery which both sides admit to be genuine (7) For the provisions of the Code as to judgments, see sect 33 and O XX, post and Index, sub voce

ment" is used in the Letters Patent of the High Courts, clauses 39 and 40, speaking respectively of appeals to the Privy Council from "any final judgment, decree or order," and from "any preliminary or interlocutory judgment, decree or order" (1) Clause 15 (and clause 10 of the Allahabad Letters Patent) speak of a "judgment" (without any such qualification) providing that an appeal to the High Court shall lie from the judgment (not being a sentence or order passed or made in any criminal trial) of one Judge of the said High Court (2) The meaning of this term in this clause has been the subject matter of discussion in numerous cases It is well settled that the term is not limited to the final judgment in the suit, (3) nor, indeed, to a judgment in a suit at all (4) In, however, the first of the cases last cited, a very wide meaning was given to the term, which was held to mean any decision or determination affecting the rights or the interest of any suitor or applicant, it being said to be impossible to prescribe any limits to the right of appeal founded upon the nature of the order or decree appealed from though, assuming that a party had the right to be heard in every case, it was obvious that the duty of the Appellate Court might vary considerably according to the nature of the order or decree complained of, and that the Appellate Court would rightly decline to interfere where the lower Court had been given a discretion (5) This view has, however, been considered to be too broad (6) and the definition commonly accepted is that of Couch, C J, (7) which has become classical, (8) having been approved in numerous cases (9)

Moreover, there were cases to which sect 575 did not apply, and to these clause 36 (or clause 27) of the Letters Patent is still applicable (1) There is an appeal from the decision of one of the Judges exercising Admiralty or Vice admiralty jurisdiction (2)

It often happens that Judges composing Divisional Benches, although they concur in the mode of deciding the appeal, either disagree as to some of the reasons or assign different reasons for their judgments But in order that there be an appeal the difference of opinion must be as to the final and complete decision of the case and not a difference of opinion upon one or more of the points arising in it (3) Points not raised before a Divisional Bench cannot be raised on appeal (4) As to limitation, see below (5)

"Order"—Reference should be made to the preceding cases in the commentary on the definition of "decree." Some others not there cited may be noticed. A suit having been instituted under the Religious Endowments Act, 1863, the plaintiff desired to withdraw the suit with liberty to sue again, and an order was made permitting him to do so, and directing that the costs be paid from the funds of the institution. It was held that the order as to costs was not a decree, and that no appeal lay (1). Orders for payment of costs under the sections noted in the decision cited are not decrees (2). The decision of a taxing officer is not an order (3). An order under O IX r 2 (formerly sect 97), post, has been held not to be a decree, (4) as also orders under sect 10, Act XX of 1863 (Madras Pagoda Act), (5) under sect 5, Religious Endowments Act (6) (XX of 1863), under sect 16, clause 7 of Madras Reg III. of 1802, (7) an order under sect 18, Act XX of 1803, refusing (8) or granting (9) leave to sue, an order under sect 84 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, (10) under sect 173 of the same Act, (11) the decision of a special Judge under sect 101, clause 2 of the same Act, (12) an order under the Indian Trust Act refusing to remove a trustee, (13) an order rejecting an application to restore an application to set aside a sale, (14) an order awarding compensation under sect 491 of the 1st Code, (15) and under sect 206 of the same Code (16).

"Pleader"—The construction of the last clause presents some difficulty. The meaning, however, of the definition becomes obvious if the clauses of which the sentence is made up are inverted, and it is read thus "Pleader means every person, including an advocate, vakil, and an attorney of a High Court, entitled to appear and plead for another in Court." It is only the pleader than that assumed to it in the General Clauses Act 1857, which is substantially the same as the first clause of this definition of the last Code. The second clause of that Code was first added in the amending Bill II of 1878, on the ground that the use of a seal capable of producing an impression of the name and title of the person using it is common amongst people of rank in this country. The definition in the last Code after the word 'stamped' added "with the name of the person referred to." The expression "person referred to" meant the person referred to in the subsequent sections of the Code as being required to sign or verify certain documents, and it is not a condition precedent to such person being able to use a stamp that he should be unable to write his name (1). As regards initialling, assuming that the person signing should, if able to write, write his name in full and certainly it is proper that this should be done in the case of a warrant—it does not follow that because the signature on the warrant is confined to the initials of the name, it was not the duty of the officer to execute it or that the debtor may forcibly resist its execution (2).

make a remand, that term being used in the former sense, then it is only in the latter sense that an erroneous order of remand can be treated as an order made without jurisdiction (1) Further difficulty has been introduced, it having been held that the same term may mean one thing in one section of the Code and another thing in another. So the term, it has been held, (2) is used in its former sense in sect 99 (formerly 578), that is, in the sense of local and pecuniary jurisdiction and jurisdiction with reference to the subject matter, while the same term in sect 115 (formerly 622), may, it is said, well be taken to have been used in a more comprehensive sense (3) The term in this section is used in the first of the senses above mentioned.

The judgment or order of a Court without jurisdiction in this last-mentioned sense is void and a mere nullity (4) Jurisdiction derives from the Sovereign, and in British India has been conferred by the Charters and Letters Patent of the High Courts, and as regards other Courts by various Acts of the Legislature constituting those Courts, giving them powers and regulating their procedure (5)

This jurisdiction may be of different kinds (a) over the parties, (b) over the subject matter, (c) local, (d) pecuniary. Peculiar powers may be given to particular Courts whilst other Courts may be of restricted jurisdiction. But no Court has power to give judgment respecting a matter not submitted to it for decision, even in a suit involving other matters which have been so submitted (6)

The distinction must be kept between jurisdiction and errors in the exercise of jurisdiction. The proceedings of a Court having jurisdiction over the subject matter and parties are not void, however erroneous they may be. A judgment is not void simply because it is erroneous. This is evident from the very notion of jurisdiction, which is the power to determine and not all respects acted as Judge, that fact is presumptive proof, until the contrary be shown, of his due appointment to act as a Judge of the Court (1) If a Judge is validly appointed but is disqualified from trying a suit by reason of his personal interest in it, (2) the judgment is erroneous and voidable but not void (3)

Assuming the existence of official authority and the absence of any disqualification, the next question is as to the jurisdiction to deal with the various matters which, in the exercise of his general judicial authority, are brought before the Judge for his determination

Jurisdiction, when used in its general sense with reference to a Court of Justice means the power or authority of judging, and that Court is said to be of competent (4) jurisdiction with regard to a suit or other proceeding, when it has power to hear or determine it or to exercise any judicial power therein (5)

Jurisdiction' said West J, (6) "according to the exact conception of it formed by the Roman lawyers, consists in taking cognizance of a case involving the determination of some legal relation, in ascertaining the essential points of it, and in pronouncing upon them" The word, however, is commonly used in two different senses in use which has led to much confusion It is in times used to mean jurisdiction in the ordinary sense above mentioned, that is, when used with reference to local or pecuniary jurisdiction or with reference to the parties, (7) or jurisdiction with reference to the subject matter (8) of a suit It is also used to mean the legal authority of a Court to do certain things Thus it has been said that if a Court has "jurisdiction" to make a remand, that term being used in the former sense, then it is only in the latter sense that an erroneous order of remand can be treated as an order made without jurisdiction (1) Further difficulty has been introduced, it having been held that the same term may mean one thing in one section of the Code and another thing in another. So the term, it has been held, (2) is used in its former sense in sect 99 (formerly 578), that is, in the sense of local and pecuniary jurisdiction and jurisdiction with reference to the subject matter, while the same term in sect 115 (formerly 622), may, it is said, well be taken to have been used in a more comprehensive sense (3) The term in this section is used in the first of the senses above mentioned.

The judgment or order of a Court without jurisdiction in this last mentioned sense is void and a mere nullity (4) Jurisdiction derives from the Sovereign, and in British India has been conferred by the Charters and Letters Patent of the High Courts, and as regards other Courts by various Acts of the Legislature constituting those Courts, giving them powers and regulating their procedure (5)

merely the power to determine rightly (1) So in the under-mentioned case the Privy Council held that a judicial sale was not a nullity and could not be treated as invalid, notwithstanding irregularity even though a material one, for the jurisdiction of the Court to execute had been complete throughout. It had not been lost by reason of an error in treating a particular person as the legal representative of the judgment debtor's estate the Court having power to decide wrongly as well as rightly (2)

It is a general principle, that whenever jurisdiction is given to a Court by an enactment, and such jurisdiction is only given on certain specified terms contained in the enactment itself, these terms must be complied with in order to create and raise the jurisdiction, for if they are not complied with the jurisdiction does not arise (3)

Consent cannot give jurisdiction, which is absent as regards the subject-matter (4) nor probably as regards local or pecuniary (5) jurisdiction. When the Judge has no inherent jurisdiction over the subject matter of a suit, the parties cannot by their mutual consent convert it into a proper judicial process, although they may constitute the Judge their arbiter and be bound by his decision on the merits when these are submitted to him (6)

(5) See Hukim Chand, Pcs Judicata, 411, 412, where it is stated that the question as to the waiver of local jurisdiction has not yet received an authoritative decision in India. In Velayudam v. Arunachala 13 M 273 (1889), it was held that there was no waiver of pecuniary jurisdiction, but the matter was one really not of jurisdiction but procedure. See Gourachandra v. Vikrama 23 M 367 (1899). In Gurdeo Singh v. Chandrikah Singh, 5 C L J 611, 623 (1907) the term "subject matter" appears to have been used in contradistinction to the other elements analysed

Where, however, the Court has jurisdiction over the subject matter and over the person and a defendant has some privilege which exempts him from the jurisdiction, such privilege may, it has been said, be waived (1). So where the objection to the jurisdiction was based on the ground of the defendant being a Sirdar of the Dekhan, who as such was not subject to the jurisdiction of the Munsif's Court which passed the decree, it was held that the defendant must be taken to have waived the want of jurisdiction and that it was too late to raise it when the decree was sought to be executed (2). And there are numerous authorities which establish that when, in a cause which the Judge is competent to try, the parties, without objection, join issue and go to trial upon the merits, the defendant cannot subsequently dispute his jurisdiction upon the grounds that there are irregularities in the initial procedure which, if objected to at the time, would have led to the dismissal of the suit (3).

Under the former Codes it was held that an objection to jurisdiction might be raised at any stage of a suit, even after remand by the High Court in second appeal (4) and that the Court would receive and adjudicate a point of jurisdiction though not taken in the lower Court, because acts done without jurisdiction are acts of no legal effect at all and might be set aside (1) At the same time it was said that though the question of jurisdiction might be taken for the first time on appeal, yet if the want of jurisdiction did not appear upon the pleadings, evidence or admissions of the parties, the Court would not, upon a mere suggestion, remand the case to ascertain further facts in order that the question of jurisdiction might be considered (2) The objection should be raised in the course of the proceedings He who having an appeal and a special appeal on a question of jurisdiction, has not availed himself of those remedies, renunciavit juri pro se introducto An omission to urge objections there is to be treated when the proceedings have been completed as conclusive (3) When no objection to the jurisdiction of the first Court was raised in the grounds of a regular appeal and the first Appellate Court declined to hear the question argued, it was held that the objection should have been considered and decided (4) The present Code, however, enacts that no objection to jurisdiction ("place of suing") shall be allowed in any appeal or revision unless taken in the Court of first instance before settlement of issues (sect 21, post)

If a party protest against jurisdiction he is not bound to retire, he can go through the case subject to protest (5) If an objection to jurisdiction is first taken at a late stage of the suit, and the jurisdiction is doubtful, the proper course is to proceed to determine the suit (6) As to the form of the order where an objection to jurisdiction is raised and allowed, see notes to O VII r 10 In some cases a party has been held to be estopped from proving want of jurisdiction in a subsequent suit (7) or in further proceedings (8)

a suit necessarily identical with the property to which the suit relates. The subject matter of a suit is generally the specific thing sought in it. In a suit for damages for injuring a carriage the subject matter would in one sense be the carriage, but the object of the suit would be the amount demanded. Where there is no material property concerned, as in a suit for slander, the subject matter cannot be identified with a tangible thing. Where, on the other hand, the claim is for a particular field, that field as a material object is sought and is regarded as the subject matter of the suit. These meanings of the term are not inconsistent. They are reconciled by saying that the field is the subject-matter in so far as it is conceived as embraced in the command or adjudication sought. Hence what is sought is the true measure of the subject-matter, not what the suit is about in a wider and vaguer sense (1). It has been recently held by a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court, that where the main purpose of a suit was to determine a right to immovable property, a Small Cause Court had nevertheless jurisdiction to entertain it if the relief asked was not for immovable property, but for payment of a sum of money (2).

In every suit the plaintiff advances two matters for determination — whether ground exists for resorting to the Court for aid, and if it does, the relief claimed as due. Neither of these matters alone is the subject-matter of the suit, to the exclusion of the other, since each alike is matter necessary to be determined in the suit before a decree can be granted to the plaintiff (3). Nor can the nature of the defendant's plea affect the jurisdiction acquired by a Court over the plaintiff's claim (4). Even an equitable claim of set off, to which O VIII r 6, post, does not apply, will not be taken cognizance of by a Court if it is in excess of its pecuniary jurisdiction, though that circumstance will not affect the jurisdiction of the Court over the suit itself (5). Jurisdiction over the subject-matter must exist throughout the proceedings in the suit. Jurisdiction must exist at the time of its institution as well as at that of its disposal (6). The decision in Shamray v Nilaji (7) is not against this view, as the decision is grounded on the circumstance that jurisdiction in proceedings taken for the execution of a decree is by law not made to depend on the amount in respect of which the execution is taken, but on the amount claimed in the suit in which the decree was given (8).

The late Supreme Court possessed no Appellate Jurisdiction but a general

as well as a local original jurisdiction embracing matters civil as well as criminal. It executed its own writs and processes throughout the provinces and districts annexed to and made subject to the Presidency of Fort William, such provinces and districts being within the limits of its general jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction of the High Court is, in some respects, analogous to that of the Supreme Court, but is, in other respects, wholly dissimilar. It has an Appellate Jurisdiction, as extensive as that possessed by the late Sudder Court, which it never exercises for the purpose of enforcing its decrees or orders the same being enforced through the subordinate Courts and it has an Extraordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction, and also an Extraordinary Original Criminal Jurisdiction, peculiar to itself. It has, besides, a Civil Jurisdiction, a Criminal Jurisdiction, an Admiralty and Vice admiralty Jurisdiction a Testamentary and Intestate Jurisdiction and a Matrimonial Jurisdiction. Sections 11 and 12 of the Letters Patent, constituting the High Court, relate to its Original Civil Jurisdiction, sect 13 to its Extraordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction, sects 21 and 22 to its Ordinary Original Criminal Jurisdiction, sect 23 to its Extraordinary Original Criminal Jurisdiction, sects 31 and 32 to its Admiralty and Vice admiralty Jurisdiction, sects 33 and 34 to its Testamentary and Intestate Jurisdiction, sect 35 to its Matrimonial Jurisdiction, and sects 24, 15, and 16 to its Appellate Jurisdiction. Its Ordinary Civil Jurisdiction unlike the Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, is merely local, as is also its Matrimonial Jurisdiction. Its Extraordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction is to try and determine any suit being or falling within the jurisdiction of any Court, whether within or without the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William, subject to its superintendence, when it shall think proper to do so, either on the agreement of the parties to that effect, or for the purposes of justice. Its Ordinary Original Criminal Jurisdiction is both local and general, and is in all respects the same as that exercised by the Supreme Court on its Crown side. Its Extraordinary Original Criminal Jurisdiction is over all persons residing in places within the jurisdiction of any Court, formerly subject to the superintendence of the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut at Calcutta, whether within or without the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William, and, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, it has authority to try, at its discretion any such persons brought before it on charges preferred by the Advocate General or by any Magistrate, or other officer, specially appointed by the Government in that behalf. Its Admiralty and Vice admiralty Jurisdiction is the same as that exercised by the Supreme Court on its Admiralty side, and by the late Vice admiralty Court. Its Testamentary and Intestate Jurisdiction is the same as that exercised by the Supreme Court on its Ecclesiastical side. As regards the Original Civil Jurisdiction of the Court, sect 2 of the Letters Patent provides that "the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal shall have, and exercise Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction, within such local limits as may, from time to time, be declared and prescribed by any law or regulation made by the Governor General in Council, and, until some local limits shall be so declared, and prescribed within the limits declared and prescribed by the Proclamation fixing the limits of Calcutta issued by the Governor General

The limits of these areas determine the local limits of the Courts' jurisdiction for the trial of original suits and appeals. Personal jurisdiction depends on the place of residence or business of the defendant. The former for transitory actions, that is, actions which are brought on occurrences which happen anywhere, depends on whether the cause of action or part of the cause of action arose within the local limits of the jurisdiction, and for local actions or actions relating to immoveable property or for the recovery of moveable property actually under distraint or attachment, depends on the situation of the property within the local jurisdiction. The case of moveable property attached or under distraint is an exception to the general rule that personal property has no locality, by which it is not meant that it has no visible locality, but that it follows the person and is governed by the law which governs him (1). The exception in the Code (2) is probably founded on the fact that in the case given the situs of the moveable property is fixed and cannot be altered by any person at his pleasure, and, perhaps, also for the convenience of judicial administration. The limits of these different areas determine the local limits of the Courts' jurisdiction for the trial of suits and appeals. The difficulty exists in what has been fitly described as the localization of suits and rules have therefore been enacted by the Legislature for determining the circumstances in which a suit may be taken cognizance of by the Courts having jurisdiction in any particular area.

Clause 12 of the Letters Patent determine the ordinary original jurisdiction of the Presidency High Courts, the High Court at Allahabad having no ordinary original civil jurisdiction (3). There has however been considerable conflict of opinion as to the several essentials of jurisdiction for which provision has been made by these Charters, (4) chiefly as to the nature of "suits for land". To avoid such differences of opinion in the Provincial Courts, the Code, in sects 16-20, post, makes detailed provisions as regards jurisdiction, and in any case governed by those sections there can hardly be any difference as to the character of the local suits to which the principle of territorial jurisdiction must be held to apply. These provisions as also those contained in the Charters are dealt with in the Notes to those sections.

It has been held that a Court has no jurisdiction to hear and decide a suit or appeal within its jurisdiction and cognizable by it, if it is instituted in a Court not having such jurisdiction, (5) even though it may be transferred to it by higher judicial authority. The Calcutta Court has held (6) that it could direct the transfer of an appeal only from a Court having jurisdiction to receive and try it, and that decision was approved of by the Judicial Committee (1)

The local limits of the Calcutta High Court were fixed by proclamation of the Governor General on 10th Sept, 1794, and are given at p 461 of Belchamber's Rules and Orders ed 1900.

As to the jurisdiction over proceedings in execution of a decree see sect 38, post

An appeal cannot be heard upon the merits unless the decree from which the appeal was preferred was passed by a Judge having jurisdiction over the matter in dispute. The Appellate Court is only a Court of Error, and the trial by an Appellate Court cannot be accepted in place of a trial by the Court of first instance (2). But though the Appellate Court cannot entertain the appeal on the merits where a Subordinate Court has no jurisdiction over the trial of a suit or appeal the Appellate Court authorized to hear appeals from that Subordinate Court has power as such to set aside its proceedings on an appeal (3). So where a defendant appealed from the Deputy Collector to the District Judge and the plaintiff then appealed to the High Court, upon an objection to the hearing of the appeal on the ground that as no appeal lay to the District Judge a fortiori no appeal lay to the High Court, the objection was overruled and the High Court reversed the decree of the District Judge and restored that of the first Court (4). As to the effect of absence of objection to jurisdiction see sect 21 post

(b) Personal jurisdiction—As already stated jurisdiction is conferred by the various Charters and Letters Patent and Acts of the Legislature to which recourse must be had, to determine the extent of jurisdiction in the case of any particular suit and Court. And such jurisdiction may be considered with reference to the (a) parties (b) subject matter (c) local and (d) pecuniary limits

In the first place this section and sect 10 of the last Code enact general rules which are applicable to all Civil Courts

Their effect may be generally, though succinctly expressed in the language of Garth, C J, in a case in which the defendant was master of an Italian vessel (5) "There is no doubt whatever that by the law of this country which is the same in that respect as the law of England Civil Courts as a general rule have jurisdiction to try all civil suits against all persons of any nationality within the local limits of their jurisdiction"

Sect 10 of the last Code dealt with jurisdiction over persons. Prior to 1850 Courts presided over by native officers were not competent to take cognizance of suits to which Europeans or Americans were parties. The Code of 1859 enacted the same rule as that contained in sect 10 of the last Code. The provisions contained in that section were first enacted by Act XI of 1836 and were reproduced in the Code of 1859, and in subsequent Codes. Their retention has been considered no longer necessary, the principle of law which it embodied having been sufficiently established.

The repeal of sect 151 of the Army Act by 51 & 52 Vict c 4, s 6, has removed the limitation on the general jurisdiction of Civil Courts in regard to suits for debt against officers holding the King's Commission (1). There are particular enactments (2) exempting from the ordinary jurisdiction particular persons or classes of persons, and sect 86, post, contains special provisions relating to princes, chiefs, ambassadors and envoys. There was nothing, however, in sect 10 which affected such personal exemptions, as they were not on the ground of descent or place of birth, but by virtue of special enactments.

The exemption of independent foreign Sovereigns from the jurisdiction of all Civil Courts is, as a general rule, universally admitted (3). As to the conditions in which protected independent native princes may be sued, see sect 86, post. "It is an attribute of sovereignty and an universal law that a State cannot be sued in its own Courts without its consent" (4). A Sovereign State may, however, bring and maintain a suit as any other suitor. As to suits by foreign States see sects 84, 87, post. In India, however, the Government, unlike the Crown, can be and is often sued. And this is so on account of the original trading character of the East India Company, who in course of time acquired the Government of India, and from whom the late Queen took over the Government. The statute 21 & 22 Vict c 106, which transferred to the Crown the possession and government of the British territories in India, expressly provided for a continuance of both the nature and the extent of liabilities with which the revenues of India in the Company's hands were chargeable. As the Crown could, however, not be sued as the East India Company could have been, in her own Courts, it was enacted by sect 65 that the Secretary of State in Council should and might sue and be sued as a Body Corporate and that all persons might have the same remedies against the Secretary of State as they could have done against the East India

(1) Pike v Carey, 1897, All W N 203.

(2) These exemptions generally have reference to the head or members of certain families which ruled tracts of country since conquered by the British Government. Preference, for instance, may be made to s 2 Act VIII of 1868, s 11, Act XVII of 1863 relating to the consent of the Governor General to suits against the ex King of Oudh and the Nawab Nazim of Bengal; to s 2 Act XL of 1873, s 1, Act XXXII of 1859 which enact the same with reference to the Prince of Arcot and certain members of the family of the late Nawab of the Carnatic named in the Act; the consent required being that of the Governor of Madras; to Act XVIII of 1818 which enacts the same with respect to certain members and servants of the family of the late Nawab of Surat named in the Act; the consent required being that of the Governor of Bombay.

(3) See Hukm Chand Res Judicata 372 et seq., Mighell v Sultan of Johore, 1894, 1 Q B 149. But a foreign sovereign may submit to the jurisdiction by a submission in the face of the Court, as for example by appearance to a writ ibid., per Lopes J.

Company, and that the property and effects thereby vested in the Crown for the purposes of the Government of India, or acquired for the said purposes, should be subject and liable to the same judgments and executions as they would, while vested in the Company, have been liable to in respect of debts and liabilities lawfully contracted and incurred by the Company. It may therefore be generally said that the liability of the Secretary of State to be sued depends on that of the East India Company, and the liability alleged must be one incurred on account of the Government of India (1). But as the latter could not be, therefore the Secretary of State cannot be, sued for all its acts. The Company, though established originally for purposes of trade, acquired in time sovereign powers (2). Therefore acts done in the execution of these sovereign powers were not subject to the control of the Municipal Courts (3). Though the principle is well established, there is some conflict of opinion as to what acts are to be deemed acts of State, and therefore beyond the cognizance of the Civil Courts (4). The meaning of an "act of State" has been defined by the Privy Council to be "something which appertains to the functions of Government" (5).

Several Indian Acts exempt from the jurisdiction of Civil Courts various acts of executive and revenue officers done in discharge of the work of administration. See, for instance, Act IX of 1859, relating to the claims to property seized as forfeited, and post, "Subject matter". The exemption in some cases only extends to certain Courts or classes of Courts (6).

the suit, whether their presence is temporary or permanent. As regards non resident foreigners, Plowden, J, in Bikrama Singh v Bur Singh (1) said "There is certainly, so far as I can ascertain, no rule of international jurisprudence universally recognized that a Municipal Court is absolutely incompetent to exercise jurisdiction over a non resident foreigner, and it is certain that in many, if not in most, countries the Municipal law authorizes the exercise of jurisdiction in such cases by its own Courts subject, generally speaking, to the condition that notice, actual or constructive, be given to the absent defendant. For instance, the Code of Civil Procedure (sect 10 of the last Code) enacted that no person should, by reason of his descent or place of birth be in any civil proceeding, exempt from the jurisdiction of any of the Courts, and in sect 89 (now O V r 25) the Code provides for service of summons out of the jurisdiction while sect 17 (now sect 20) authorizes the Court to take cognizance of certain suits when the cause of action has arisen within the jurisdiction." It appears however, to be generally agreed upon that even the personal service of a summons on a non resident foreigner at his foreign domicile can create no jurisdiction so as to render the judgment enforceable in the Courts of any other State (2) inasmuch as no Sovereignty can extend its powers beyond its own territorial limits to subject either persons or property to its judicial decision. And there is no principle for holding that the mere possession of property in the foreign country would by reason of the protection enjoyed, confer on the Courts of that country jurisdiction over a foreigner neither domiciled nor resident therein in respect of matters unconnected with the property (3). Whilst every tribunal may execute process against property within its jurisdiction, existence of such property affords no sufficient ground for imposing on the foreign owner of that property a duty or obligation to fulfil the judgment (4). See, further, as to personal jurisdiction and residence, sects 19 and 20, post and notes thereon.

No sort of jurisdiction can be obtained against one who was dead when the suit was commenced against him as a defendant or in his name as plaintiff, and a judgment for or against him must necessarily be void (5). If a suit is once validly commenced in any Court, jurisdiction is not taken away by the change of residence or country by the defendant, and the weight of authority is in favour of the view that jurisdiction is not divested by death of either party after the institution of the suit and a judgment rendered after a party's death, though erroneous, is voidable and not void (6).

(c) Pecuniary jurisdiction—Throughout the country there are Courts of different grades having jurisdiction in suits of different amounts in certain prescribed local areas. In determining therefore whether any Court has jurisdiction over any particular suit, regard must be had not only to the nature of the suit but also to the pecuniary extent of the Court's jurisdiction which are to be found in the various Acts under which the Courts are constituted.

The only limit upon the original jurisdiction of the Presidency High Courts is the exclusion of cases falling within the jurisdiction of the Presidency Small Cause Courts in which the debt or damage or value of the property sued for does not exceed 100 rupees.

In the case of the Courts governed by the Bengal N W P and Assam Civil Courts Act (VII of 1887) the jurisdiction of a District Judge or Subordinate Judge extends subject to the provisions of sect. 15 of the Code (which provisions have been held not to affect jurisdiction but to be matter of procedure only (2)) to all original suits for the time being cognizable by Civil Courts. The jurisdiction of a Munsif unless extended by notification, is limited to like suits the value of which does not exceed 1000 rupees (3). The Bombay Civil Courts Act (XIV of 1869) provides for District Joint Assistant and Subordinate Judges, the latter of whom are of two classes. The jurisdiction of the first class extends to all suits and of the second to suits and proceedings of which the subject matter does not exceed in amount or value 5000 rupees (4).

The Oudh Civil Courts are governed by Act XIII of 1879. There are four grades of Courts. The Judicial Commissioner and District Judge who have appellate jurisdiction and the latter original jurisdiction also and Subordinate Judges and Munsifs whose jurisdiction subject to notification is 10 000 rupees and 1000 rupees respectively (5).

Every suit must be instituted in the Court of the lowest grade competent to try it (6). What prima facie determines the jurisdiction is the claim or subject matter of the claim as estimated by the plaintiff and this determination having given the jurisdiction the jurisdiction itself continues whatever the event of the suit unless a different principle comes into operation to prevent such a result or to make the proceedings from the first abortive (7).

The subject-matter and value of a suit is determined by the plaintiff's statement of demand. Jurisdiction is not affected by the defendant's plea, it being a fundamental principle that competence is determined by the plaintiff's demand and not by the defendant's answer, which only impugns the existence of the demand but does not alter or affect its nature (1). It is the claim therefore and not the defence which is to be looked at for the purpose of determining jurisdiction (2).

As regards the mode of valuation, the value need not on general principles be always the same as that for the purpose of levy of court fees. Formerly questions frequently arose as to the distinction between the valuation of a suit for the purposes of stamp duty and the valuation of the subject-matter of the suit for the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of the Court (3). Since, however, the passing of the Suits Valuation Act of 1887 these questions do not generally arise, for that Act (4) provides that where in suits other than those referred to in the Court Fees Act 1870 s 7, sub ss v, vi, ix, x, xi (d), court fees are payable ad valorem under the Court Fees Act, 1870, the value as determinable for the computation of court-fees and the value for purposes of jurisdiction shall be the same. This provision applies to Appellate Courts as well as to Courts of first instance (5). The effect therefore of the Suits Valuation Act has been to assimilate the value for court fees and for jurisdiction and thus to avoid an independent inquiry to determine the jurisdiction of Courts (6). Where, however, the value determinchief reason why the amount which is proved and claimed in a suit does not determine or affect the jurisdiction over it is that the Court has to consider and inquire in the suit, not only as to that amount, but as to the total amount asked for in the plaint, and discussed in the proceedings, the claim for the portion dismissed being adjudicated upon not less than that for the portion decreed. Nor is the other course practicable, as the amount proved cannot be known at the commencement of the suit, and jurisdiction must be fixed before proceedings are commenced and evidence entered upon (1). The pecuniary jurisdiction of a Civil Court on its original or appellate side is ordinarily speaking governed by the value stated by the plaintiff in his plaint, but if a suit having regard to the valuation in the plaint is within the jurisdiction it is not ousted by the Court finding that a decree for a sum exceeding the limits of its pecuniary jurisdiction should be given to the plaintiff (2).

It is a well known principle that the merits of a demand are immaterial as affecting jurisdiction. It is a mistaken conception that jurisdiction depends on facts or the actual existence of matters or things instead of upon the allegations concerning them (3). The question of jurisdiction does not depend upon the truth or falsehood of the claim, but upon its nature, it is determinable at the commencement, not at the conclusion, of the inquiry (4). It has, however, been held in this country that a plaintiff cannot give jurisdiction to or take away jurisdiction from a Court by adding to his claim something to which he was not entitled upon any view of the case, and such unwarrantable addition to his claim must be struck out and the jurisdiction of the Court determined with reference to the rest of his claim (5).

But the cases referred to in the first of the last mentioned decisions appear, it has been pointed out, (6) to proceed upon a misconception of the nature of jurisdiction as stated above, unless they may be justified on the ground that an "exaggerated claim thus brought for the purpose of getting a trial in a different Court is substantially a fraud upon the law, and must be rejected, whether it arises from mere recklessness or from an artful design to get the adjudication of one Judge instead of that of another," (1) a principle which may apply when the intention of evading the competency of jurisdiction is certain (2) In practice, however, the establishment of fraud, which should not be presumed, involves considerable difficulties To every case in which the demand is evidently exaggerated there will be many which will be really doubtful and where the Judge might act according to his own peculiar views in declaring himself incompetent to take cognizance of a demand beyond the pecuniary limits of his jurisdiction, as he finds it too excessive (3)

The general effect, however, of the Suits Valuation Act is, as already stated, to avoid an independent inquiry to determine the jurisdiction of Courts, and this question, in respect of simple overvaluation, as distinguished from other additions to the claim, (4) is not so likely to arise as formerly And in the case of appeals the matter is now regulated by sect 11 of the Suits Valuation Act Since the passing of that Act it has been held that while it is no doubt a sound rule that Courts should not allow parties to evade the law relating to matters of jurisdiction and that where it is found that a party has intentionally exaggerated his claim in order to bring his suit in a Court which otherwise would not have jurisdiction to try it, before the merits of the claim have been gone into the plaint should be returned to be presented to the proper Court, yet this rule must be taken with qualifications and one important qualification is that embodied in sect 11 of the Suits Valuation Act, namely that where the suit has been tried on its merits by the first Court, and the overvaluation of the suit is not found to have prejudicially affected the disposal of the suit on the merits, there the objection as to jurisdiction should not be given effect to A plaintiff who alters the valuation of his suit for the purpose of evading jurisdiction may be punished by having no costs allowed to him, but it does not conduce to promote the ends of justice if an Appellate Court were to set aside a decision which is found to be correct on the merits simply because the value of the suit had been designedly increased or diminished to evade jurisdiction (5)

question of essential jurisdiction throughout the suit. The jurisdiction in appeals and execution is determined primarily by the amount or value of the subject-matter of the original suit. Appeals from decrees of original Courts when allowed, lie "to the Courts authorized to hear appeals" from these Courts (1). Appeals from orders lie to the Court to which an appeal lies from a decree (2). In the case of appeals to the Privy Council, the value of the subject-matter must be Rs 10,000 and upwards, and the amount or value of the matter in dispute on appeal must not be less than that amount (3). But in the case of all other appeals the valuation of the dispute on appeal is not considered even in determining whether an appeal is to lie. It was formerly contended that the appeal should be held to lie to the Court having jurisdiction over the amount in dispute in the appeal but it is now settled that the value of the original suit, and not of the matter in dispute in the appeal, is the criterion by which to determine appellate jurisdiction. It is thus the money value of the original suits that fixes the jurisdiction of the Courts throughout the subsequent litigation in its several stages, and not the value of what has been left in dispute (4). Not only does the jurisdiction continue throughout the suit but whatever may be the result of the suit in all such proceedings also such as execution, as by the Code are brought within its cognizance as incidental to the suit. Jurisdiction is not lost in execution because the interest accrued after decree has raised the amount due above the money limit (5). See generally as to execution sect 38, post.

"Civil nature"—This will exclude all criminal proceedings but the term "civil" cannot be considered as merely the opposite of criminal for there are suits which, though not relating to matters of a criminal are yet not of a civil nature. Thus the explanation which merely declares and enacts the law as it has always been administered by the Court shows that suits as to religious rites or ceremonies, which involve no question of right to property or to an office, are not suits of a civil nature, (1) and as such cognizable by the Courts, which have also in some cases refused to interfere in matters of a purely social nature. Rights of a civil nature mean such rights as are vested in the citizen and fall within the domain of private and not of public law. (2) These rights relate both to property and to the person, and suits may be for the recovery of possession, or damages, or for specific relief. Wherever a right is recognized by law, a suit will lie to enforce it unless it is barred by any enactment on the principle ubi jus ibi remedium. What are such rights is the subject matter of substantive law and not of procedure, and therefore need not be discussed here. (3) The question whether a suit is of a civil nature is not necessarily the same as that whether it is cognizable, as the cognizability depends not only on the nature of the suit, but on the recognition by positive law of the existence of the rights stated and of the right to the redress sought. So suits for enforcement of rights relating to caste are suits of a civil nature though they are not always cognizable by the Courts as such. In the Bengal Presidency, suits for restoration to caste were made expressly so cognizable by Bengal Reg. III of 1793 and have been often taken cognizance of by the Courts. Whilst, on the other hand Bombay Reg. II of 1827, in giving Civil Courts a cognizance "generally of all suits and complaints of a civil nature," expressly provided that "no interference on the part of the Court in caste questions is hereby warranted beyond the admission and trial of any suit instituted for the recovery of damages on account of an alleged injury to the caste and character of the plaintiff, arising from some illegal act or unjustifiable conduct of the other party" (4).

Again, a suit for violation of a right of privacy is not generally allowed because the suit is not recognized by the general law of India and not because such a suit is not of a civil nature a suit of that character being allowed in Gujarat and various districts of the N W P, where the right is recognized under local custom. In addition to suits relating to caste, reference may be made to certain others in regard to which questions have arisen from time to time. Suits relating to marriage have long been held cognizable by Civil Courts having been made expressly so in the Bengal Presidency by Bengal Reg III of 1793—such as suits to declare the validity or invalidity or jactitation of marriage, for damages for breach of, though not for specific performance of, marriage, and restitution of conjugal rights.

As already stated, and as appears from the section, suits merely relating to religious rights and ceremonies will not be entertained unless they involve a right to property or to an office. The latter may be either of a personal character, such as that of a family priest, or may be a local office. Personal offices are gradually losing their legal character as such, and the law now appears generally to recognize only local offices—that is offices connected with a certain temple, ghat, or locality which are essentially distinct from personal offices (1).

“Either expressly or impliedly barred”—The words in the former Code, “barred by any enactment for the time being in force” were held to mean expressly barred, and therefore the giving of a concurrent remedy did not bar a suit (2). As to whether the matter would now fall within the implied bar, vide post. Enactments affecting the jurisdiction of Courts will be construed so far as possible to avoid the effect of transferring the determination of rights and liabilities from the ordinary Courts to executive officers (3). The jurisdiction of a Civil Court is not excluded unless the cognizance of the entire suit as brought is barred (4). The most important restrictions on the jurisdiction of the ordinary Civil Courts over civil suits are enacted by the Acts relating to the revenue or the rent of the agricultural or other lands assessed with the Government demand. The provisions of these Acts are different for different provinces but they all appear to be based on the principle that matters likely to affect the liability for, or the amount of, the Government Land Revenue, should be adjudicated upon by Revenue Officers, who have better acquaintance with such matters and with a procedure more elastic and summary than that of the ordinary Civil Courts (1) As instances of the particular matters falling within the cognizance of Revenue Courts, and of which the Civil Courts can therefore not take cognizance, reference may be made to sects 93, 95, and 211 of the North Western Provinces Rent Act (XII of 1901), (2) sect 158 of the Punjab Land Revenue Act (XVII of 1887), (3) sects 76 and 77 of the Punjab Tenancy Act (XVI of 1887), (4) sects 4 and 5 of the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act (X of 1876) (5) It has however, been recently held by the Bombay High Court that sect 4 (c) of the last named Act is not a bar to a suit in which there is a claim arising out of the alleged illegality of proceedings taken for the realization of land revenue (6)

In the Madras Presidency (7) and in Lower Bengal the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts in rent and tenancy cases has not, as a general rule been excluded By Act VIII (B C) of 1869 Revenue Courts were abolished over the greater part of Bengal and the trial of rent suits was made over to the ordinary Civil Courts (8) The bar is in some cases due to administrative requirements and practical convenience Thus the Municipal Acts of some of the provinces contain special provisions barring the cognizance of suits by Civil Courts chiefly in matters relating to taxation (9)

Somewhat on a similar principle sect 133 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that no order made by a Magistrate under that section "shall be called in question in any Civil Court," though this provision has been held not to bar a suit for a declaration of a person's exclusive right to any land which the Magistrate may have declared or assumed to be public highway (10) And it has been held that under this section the fact that a criminal trial has not resulted in a conviction is no bar to a civil suit against the accused (11) In some cases the bar against civil jurisdiction is merely of a provisional character, as in the case of the Pensions Act of 1871 (1) The Civil Courts are bound to respect an order passed by a Magistrate when he is acting within his jurisdiction, (2) but a suit has been held to lie declaring that the order of a Magistrate passed under sect 518, Act X. of 1872, was without jurisdiction, and giving relief by declaring the plaintiff's right (3) As also one for maintenance of a child notwithstanding the order of a magistrate refusing maintenance (4)

A judgment and decree vitiated by fraud or collusion is a nullity, and a suit will lie to set it aside (5) There is no enactment barring the Court's jurisdiction to entertain a suit to set aside, on the ground of fraud, a decree passed by another Court of concurrent jurisdiction (6) While the question whether a decree sought to be executed was obtained by fraud is not within the scope of sect 47, post, and can only be raised by a separate suit, if, however the decree is not impeached for fraud, but only the execution proceedings thereunder, the question must be raised in those proceedings, and not by separate suit (7) A grant of probate is not in the nature of a summary proceeding to be contested by a regular suit in the Civil Court The grant must be contested by an application to revoke in the Court of Probate (8) The grant of probate is the decree of a Court which no other Court can set aside except for fraud or want of jurisdiction (9)

The former section dealt only with bar by special enactment, but there are other cases in which a suit is not allowed to lie, on general principles of law The amended section includes an implied bar In some cases a suit is not allowed as there is no substantive right giving rise to a cause of action by reason of the non recognition of the right, on account of some rule of statutory or common law or of some principle of public policy or morality So a special procedure having been provided in the Criminal Procedure Code in regard to public roads, a suit will not lie for obstructing a public road unless the plaintiff has suffered special damage As regards, however, nuisances, see now sect 91, post Certain suits are barred in the interest of public morality These cases proceed on the ground that a Court ought not to enforce contracts injurious to and against the public good, and not on the ground that the suit is not of a civil nature or there is a defect in the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts over it (10) Again, a suit does not lie to recover a voluntary payment because there is no right to recover (11) Where a statute enacts a right or an obligation, and provides a method of enforcing it, that method and not the remedy at Common Law must be followed. Where, however, a statute is confirmatory of a pre-existing right, the new remedy is presumed as cumulative or alternative unless an intention to the contrary appears from some other part of the statute (1). The Madras High Court has recognized that principle in disallowing suits brought to enforce registration otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of sect 77 of the Indian Registration Act. The Calcutta, Madras, and Allahabad High Courts hold that a suit will not lie to compel the registration of a document after a refusal by the sub-registrar to register the same except in accordance with these provisions (2). Again, when by an Act of the Legislature powers are given to any person, for a public purpose, from which an individual may receive an injury if the mode of redressing the injury is pointed out by the Act, the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts is ousted, and in case of injury the party cannot proceed by ordinary action (3). So, the Code providing a special method of paying the necessary expenses of a witness, the latter cannot sue for them (4). Every Court is competent to award costs in any proceedings, and a separate suit will therefore not lie for their recovery (5).

No bar to a suit will be implied, however, from the provision of a summary and special remedy in a special Act for a right existing under common law. Thus a suit for compensation for wrongful seizure of cattle will lie in a Civil Court, the provisions of Act I of 1871 being no bar to it (6). A suit may be brought for confirmation of an execution sale which has been set aside by the Court, (7) or, if the execution should have been transferred to the Collector, by the Collector, (8) ordering the sale. So also under the last Code it was held that, notwithstanding sects 318, 319, 328, and 331 of that Code, under which action might be taken by a purchaser at an execution sale to recover possession of the property purchased, a regular suit might also be brought by him for the recovery of the same, (1) the two remedies being concurrent. And notwithstanding the procedure under sect 152, O XX r 6, sect 114, O XLVII r 1, post, may be available, there is nothing to prevent a suit to rectify a mistake in a decree (2)

Generally, where a decree holder can proceed under the execution sections he cannot bring a regular suit. So where, having obtained a decree for money, A sued to recover the unsatisfied balance thereof from B, alleging that the property of the deceased judgment debtor was in his possession it was held that he should have enforced his decree by execution and sale or by execution and attachment and appointment of a receiver, and no regular suit would lie (3). A suit does not lie for damages for non compliance with a mandatory injunction to compel the performance of which the plaintiff had his remedy in execution (4). Nor will a suit lie for the costs of a receiver which were deducted in execution of a decree for mesne profits from the amount of such mesne profits, inasmuch as the objection to such deduction should have been urged in the execution proceedings (5). So, in the case of an ordinary action in ejectment in which a plaintiff gets a decree for possession of the property, if he takes no steps to execute that decree within the time allowed by law, he cannot by a fresh suit, based either on the decree or on his title as it stood at the time that the first suit was brought, evade the law of limitation (6). A person suing on his proprietary title to recover possession of mortgaged property on the ground that the mortgage had been satisfied, and obtaining an unconditional decree for possession, is in the same position (7). The principle is that once any right has been enforced by a suit in which a decree has been obtained, the decree becomes the embodiment of that right, and that right in its inchoate state is merged in the decree (8) the enforcement of which, if not barred by limitation must be by proceedings taken to execute it. As regards suits for redemption, considerable conflict exists. In some cases the existence of a prior decree for redemption unexecuted has been held to bar a subsequent decree for the same relief. The question has been variously viewed from the standpoint of the general principles referred to and the applicability of sect 11 (formerly sect 13) and sect 47 (formerly sect 214) of the Code. It appears to be agreed that in some cases sect 13 would have barred the subsequent suit. A Full Bench of the

Allahabad High Court has held that the nature of redemption decrees makes sect 244 (now 47) inapplicable, and that the operation of the rule of res judicata depends upon the nature of the decree made in the previous suits in each instance. Where a Court has once adjudicated upon a mortgagor's right to redeem, so many of the issues as bore upon that, and are heard and determined, become res judicata and cannot be reopened, but unless there has been a determination that the mortgagor has no right to redeem, there would still remain one other issue in a subsequent suit, which would not be res judicata. Until a mortgagee has applied for an order of sale under sect 93 of the Transfer of Property Act (see now O XXXIV r 8), the plaintiff's right to redeem exists and can be at any time enforced. If therefore a mortgagor has obtained a decree for redemption, which does not contain a provision foreclosing the right of redemption on default, and has not enforced that decree and has not paid in the decretal amount within time he can subsequently bring a second suit for redemption of the mortgage in respect of which such first decree was obtained (1). On the other hand a Full Bench of the Madras High Court has held that where a suit for redemption has been instituted and a decree for redemption has been passed therein but not executed a subsequent suit is not maintainable for the redemption of the same mortgage. The equity of redemption no doubt remains unenforced and the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee continues until an order absolute under sect 93 (see now O XXXIV r 8) is made, and having regard to the continuance of the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, earlier decisions of the same High Court held that as such jural relation had not been put an end to a second suit would lie. The Full Bench, however held that though the right might exist, the remedy was barred by sect 11 (formerly sect 13) of the Code. A decree for redemption passed under sect 92 of the Transfer of Property Act (see now O XXXIV r 7) is a final judgment within the meaning of sect 11, post, but if the order absolute for foreclosure or sale under sect 93 is the final judgment, and the decree under sect 92 (see now O XXXIV r 7) is interlocutory then if no order is passed under sect 93, the suit is pending and sect 10 (formerly sect 12) post bars a second trial. The fact, therefore, that no order absolute has been made under sect 93 (see now O XXXIV r 8), extinguishing the right to redeem, will not allow of a second suit being brought, though it will entitle the mortgagor to exercise his right of redemption under the decree if he be not barred by limitation by obtaining a postponement of the day fixed for payment (2). The Bombay High Court has held that a decree for redemption, on the default of the decree holder to pay the money declared to be due within the time fixed by the decree, or, if none be fixed, within the time allowed by law for the execution of the decree, operates as a judgment of foreclosure and debars the mortgagor from afterwards bringing a second suit to redeem the same property (3). As regards the Calcutta High Court, the only two reported decisions appear to be in conflict (1) In the under-mentioned case, (2) a second suit was allowed on the ground that the first suit did not in default foreclose the right to redeem, and that the cause of action in the two suits was not the same thus excluding the doctrine of res judicata. In, however, a subsequent case (3) it was contended that until an order absolute for sale was made the right to redeem existed, and that the suit should be regarded as a suit to redeem. In overruling this contention, the Court observed as follows "Even if there is no order absolute, the decree nisi directing the sale is in existence, and if the right to redeem be still alive, it cannot be enforced by a separate suit"

When a decree declaring a right to partition has not been given effect to by the parties proceeding to partition in accordance with it, it is competent to the parties, or any of them, if they still continue to be interested in the joint property, to bring another suit for a declaration of a right to a partition in case their right to partition is called in question at a time when, by reason of limitation or otherwise, they cannot put into effect the decree first obtained. In this respect, suits for declaration of right to partition differ from most other suits (4). In this case there was no decree actually making partition, while in the under mentioned case, (5) in which there was a decree directing partition, it was held that such decree operated as res judicata, and the subsequent suit was barred.

A second suit will lie if the first suit is for money against A, and the second to realize the decree from the property of a stranger thereto (6).

Prima facie an action lies on the judgment of every Court of competent jurisdiction unless the right to sue be taken away expressly or by implication (7).

Upon the judgment arises a legal obligation to discharge it on which an action is maintainable (1). It is by such an action that the judgments of foreign and colonial Courts are supported and enforced and suits on foreign judgments are not infrequent in this country. A suit will lie on a judgment of a Court in a Native State (2). Where an action on a judgment or decree will not give to the plaintiff a higher or better remedy than he already has there is no advantage in allowing it to be brought, and it would be contrary to the spirit of the Code to do so. Where it will give a higher or better remedy the case is different and there are cases in which an action may be the only mode of enforcing a judgment or decree (3). In the case of a domestic judgment ample provisions exist for the execution of the decree not only within the jurisdiction of the Court by which it was passed but within any part of the British territories in India. And on the principles already adverted to, where provisions have been made in regard to execution and the decree holder can proceed under them he cannot bring a regular suit. In such cases the qualification to the general rule comes into operation the right to sue being taken away by implication.

A suit will not lie in a Small Cause Court on a decree of a Subordinate Judge's Court (4) or on a decree of its own (5) as the law makes full provision as to the mode of obtaining satisfaction of such decrees. Nor will a suit lie on a rent decree of the Revenue Court (6) nor in the High Court on a decree of the Small Cause Court (7) otherwise in Bombay in order that the judgment creditor may have execution against the immovable estate of the debtor (8).

In the under mentioned undefended case (9) under the preceding Code Wilson J. held that a suit on a decree of the High Court would lie in that Court as the decree had remained unsatisfied and it was too late to revive it in the usual way. But this decision has been dissented from by the Bombay High Court (10). A suit has also been held to lie on a declaratory decree of which no execution can be taken (11). But a person who has obtained a decree establishing his right and entitling him to consequential relief cannot again sue for the same, but can only work out his right and obtain the relief by executing the decree. And sect 47, post, expressly prohibits a separate suit for the purpose (1). No suit will lie where the decree orders a certain amount to be paid for maintenance at certain intervals, as execution may be taken of such a decree for amounts accruing due under it subsequent to its date (2). A suit has also been held to lie in the Civil Court on a decree obtained in the Court of the Agent for Sirdars against the defendant's father, the decree, which was for payment of a sum of money by instalments, having become incapable of execution on the death of the defendant's father, the defendant himself not being a sirdar (3).

A suit has been held to lie for the amount of an unsatisfied claim adjudged by a decree which was destroyed during the Mutiny pending an appeal taken by the defendant, the cause of action to date from the lost decree (4). This was distinguished in a subsequent case in which the records were not destroyed before a decision on appeal, it being held that where the records of a case are destroyed, the plaintiff may prove his decree and get the execution of it, but, on his inability to do so, he cannot bring a second suit for the same subject matter (5). A suit, however, should not be allowed, whether the record is destroyed before or after the decision of the appeal (6). A suit does not lie on a decree of which execution is barred by limitation (7). And where a plaintiff has obtained a decree, and has by his own neglect lost his right to execute it, he will not be permitted to revert to the position which he held before the institution of the suit and to bring a fresh suit (8).

A decree or judgment must be considered valid until reversed or superseded. Therefore, a suit does not lie to recover back money recovered in instituted suit between the same parties, or between parties under whom they or any of them claim litigating under the same title where such suit is pending in the same or any other Court in British India having jurisdiction to grant the relief claimed, or in any Court beyond the limits of British India established or continued by the Governor General in Council and having like jurisdiction, or before His Majesty in Council

Explanation—The pendency of a suit in a foreign Court does not preclude the Courts in British India from trying a suit founded on the same cause of action

“Lis pendens”—“The object of the rule contained in sect 12 (the present section) of the Code is to prevent Courts of concurrent jurisdiction from simultaneously entertaining and adjudicating upon two parallel litigations in respect of the same cause of action the same subject matter and the same relief The policy of the law is to confine the plaintiff to one litigation thus obviating the possibility of contradictory verdicts by two or more Courts in respect of ‘the same relief’ ” (8)

The same learned Judge added It is scarcely necessary to say that the rule contained in sect 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure forms no part of the rule of res judicata though the reason upon which it is based is in some respects similar in principle to the doctrine of res judicata. The distinction between the two rules however, is vast. The rule in sect 12 (the present section) relates to matters sub judice, whilst the rule in sect 13 (now sect 11) relates to matters which have passed into rem judicatam. The one bars only a 'suit', the other bars both the trial of a 'suit' and of an 'issue' subject to their respective conditions. Those conditions are not all the same in sect 12 (the present section) as they are in sect 13 (now sect 11), and the wording of the two sections as to the distinction is so clear that it is not easy to confound the two rules. Now, in sect 12 (the present section), before the plea can operate as a bar, the second suit must not only raise the same issue as that in the former suit still pending, but it must be for 'the same relief' (1). As to this last now, vide post, "Relief". It may be added that if a plaintiff were not confined to one litigation, but were allowed to conduct a number of parallel litigations at the same time, they would result in as many judgments which, if to the same effect, would be useless and a cause of unnecessary expense. If, on the other hand they were to a different effect all would not admit of execution and it would not be possible to decide which should be executed. Moreover, contradictory judgments would tend to discredit the administration of justice. The rule, therefore should be such as to receive application only when the various incidents of the suits are so far identical that they may, and if rightly decided should lead to the same judgment (2). Though the conditions of the two rules relating to lis pendens and res judicata are different, the expressions used in enumerating them are generally used in the same sense, and reference therefore may be made to the cases cited in the next section. The rule of lis pendens not only affects a suit brought while another suit is pending, but also alienations of rights or interests in any property made during the pendency of a suit concerning that property (3).

Stay—The words "Except where a suit has been stayed under sect 20" have been omitted. Sect 20 of the last Code dealt with the power of the Court to stay proceedings, but, apart from this the Court had a general jurisdiction to stay proceedings on the ground of inconvenience attending the trial of different suits in different Courts at the same time. So the High Court has stayed a suit instituted before it until after the decree in a suit previously instituted at Calcutta observing that the two suits to a very great extent covered the same ground and that it was impossible that they should proceed together, as many inconveniences might arise—amongst others difficulties in connection with the filing of documents and taking of accounts and the possibility of a conflict of decisions, adding that it was necessary to follow the general rule that the plaintiff who first brings his suit claiming an account in respect of any particular transactions has a right to have that account taken in the Court in which he has chosen to bring his suit (1) Sect 20 has now been omitted

"Proceed with the trial"—This section in the last Code only provided that no suit shall be tried if the same issues were involved in a previously instituted suit in a competent Court. The present Code substitutes the words at the head of the paragraph to explain more clearly the action to be taken by the Court, which is in the nature of a stay of proceedings. The section however is merely intended to secure general convenience. It does not bar the institution of a suit and therefore cannot be construed as dispensing with the institution of a suit within the proper time when the law expressly requires such institution (2)

"Suit"—In the under mentioned case (3) the Court without expressing a decided opinion on the point thought that a proceeding in execution being not a suit but only a proceeding in a suit it would be more correct to hold that a proceeding under sect 47 is not a suit within the meaning of this section

"Matter in issue,"—The matter in issue in the subsequent suit must also be directly and substantially in issue in the previously instituted suit. The subject matter in respect of which the relief is claimed must be the same in the two suits the principle of lis pendens having no application if the subject matter of the subsequent suit is not in any sense the subject matter of the previous suit (4). Where the question of title was the same but the issues were different relating to another plot of land and to another period of time the section was held to have no application (5)

"Previously instituted (pending) suit"—Priority in time is the proper guide in determining which suit should be allowed to proceed (6) and in accordance with the general principle that the Court which first acquires jurisdiction should retain it this rule is formulated. The section says 'instituted', that is mere institution of a suit will give priority without any proceedings having been taken thereunder. A suit ceases to be lis pendens when it has been withdrawn and the rule has been held not to apply when the former suit has been withdrawn since the institution of the second suit (7). A suit of course, comes to an end when a decree is passed in it. It is not, however, material whether the suit is pending as an original suit or an appeal. A pending appeal will bar the trial of a subsequent suit (1). The mere applying however for, or obtaining, leave to appeal to the Privy Council cannot of itself amount to the pending of an appeal till such appeal is actually filed, for it may happen that the parties who obtain such leave may never appeal at all against such decree or order (2). It has been held that the appeal is not "to be deemed to relate to the entry of the judgment appealed from so as to defeat the plaintiff's action properly brought intermediate the judgment and appeal" (3). In a recent case where there had been a decree for maintenance, followed two years later by a decree for the sale of the property charged by it, but three more years elapsed before the application for execution it was held that owing to this delay the doctrine of lis pendens did not apply for the sale had not been during the active prosecution of a contentious suit or proceeding (4).

"Relief"—The last Code enacted that not merely must the matter in issue be the same, but the previous suit must claim the same relief. The cause of action is essentially different from the relief claimed. While the identity, or even similarity of the relief claimed is not material for the rule of res judicata the identity of the relief was held essential to the application of the rule of lis pendens. So the section was held not to apply where, though the issue may be the same as that in the other suit the relief was not the same (5). And it has been held not to apply to suits between principals and agents for accounts (6). Where the plaintiff in the first instance sued the defendant for cancellation of a putni lease and for mesne profits, and then brought a second suit against the defendant to recover arrears of rent for the same period it was held that sect. 12 of the last Code did not apply, as it could not be said that the former suit was for the same relief as that claimed in the second suit (7). So again suits for the same dues in respect of different years are not for the same relief. If a suit for a demand for one year should bar the trial of a suit for the same demand for a subsequent year the prolongation of the earlier litigation might result in barring the later suit by lapse of the limitation period (8). If the subsequent suit is however for a part of the relief claimed in the first suit its trial was held to be barred by that of the first suit (1). It will however be observed that this section omits the words formerly appearing "for the same relief". This was stated to have been done because the Select Committee were of opinion that the application of the provision should depend not upon the mere prayer of the parties but upon the matter in issue. Probably in a large number of cases where the matter in issue is the same the relief deriving as a consequence therefrom will be or should be the same. But however this may be the section apparently substitutes as a test the identity of the matter in issue irrespective of the relief sought upon the proof of the facts alleged in such issue.

"Same parties" —Not only must the persons be the same but they must be suing or sued in the same capacity. Where the same person sues in different capacities it is the same as if there were different persons (2). The section has been amended to show that the litigation must be under the same title.

"Jurisdiction" —The Court must have had jurisdiction to grant relief in the previous suit. So in the under mentioned case (3) the Court observed

It is clear that in this case the proceedings pending before the Revenue Officer were not for the same relief (that is for ejectment of the defendants and for mesne profits) as was sought in the present suit nor had the Revenue Officer jurisdiction to grant such relief.

Foreign Court —Referring to this explanation the Court observed (4) "That it seems to follow as a necessary consequence that the existence of a decree in a foreign Court is no bar to the execution of a decree of a Court in British India even though the cause of action in both suits be the same."

11 No Court shall try any suit or issue in which the matter is directly and substantially in issue has been
Res judicata directly and substantially in issue in a former suit between the same parties or between parties under whom they or any of them claim litigating under the same title in a Court competent to try such subsequent suit or the suit in which such issue has been subsequently raised, and has been heard and finally decided by such Court.

Presumption as to foreign judgments

Res judicata generally considered—These sections embody the doctrine of res judicata, which, though it has sometimes been treated in English law as a branch of the doctrine of estoppel, is yet essentially distinct from it. Estoppel, which is dealt with by sect 115 of the Evidence Act, proceeds upon the equitable principle of altered situation, whilst the doctrine of res judicata proceeds on the principle that there should be a determination to litigation and that a defendant should not in respect of the same matter be harassed by several suits. Estoppel is a part of the law of evidence whilst res judicata belongs to the province of procedure strictly so called (1). Perhaps the shortest way to describe the difference between the two is to say that whilst the plea of res judicata prohibits the Court from entering into an inquiry at all as to a matter already adjudicated upon an estoppel prohibits a party after the inquiry has already been entered upon from proving anything which would contradict his own previous declarations or acts to the prejudice of another party who, relying upon those declarations or acts altered his position. In other words res judicata prohibits an inquiry in limine whilst an estoppel is only a piece of evidence (2).

The English doctrine of res judicata was adopted in this country before the promulgation of the first Code of 1859. As the Judicial Committee observed (3) upon the statement of the rule in the Duchess of Kingston's case, there is nothing technical or peculiar to the law of England in the rule as so stated. It was recognized by the civil law and was consistent with sect 2 of the Code of 1859. Though, however consistent with it, sect 2 of that Code was not identical with and fell considerably short of it (4). It only provided for bar by judgment, and did not deal with the remaining portion of the rule relating to the bar of the trial of an issue by judgment on that issue which has sometimes been called bar by verdict. The gist of this latter rule is that an actual decision on any matter directly in issue in a suit is conclusive of that issue in every subsequent suit brought on any cause and for any purpose or object. Notwithstanding this defect in the rule the Courts acting

(1) Res judicata precludes a man from avowing the same thing in successive litigations while estoppel prevents his saying one thing at one time and the opposite at another. Cassamally v Currimbhoy, 36 B 214 (1911), Bhaisankar v Morari, 36 B 253 (1911), Baleshwar Bagarti v Bhagurathi Das, 35 C 701 (1908), Bhagurathi Das v Baleshwar Bagarti 41 C 1 (1913). on general principles, recognized the conclusiveness of judgments as to issues also, the principle of res judicata, whether specially enacted or not, being an essential part of the law of procedure in all countries (1) Other difficulties also arose with reference to the meaning to be attached to the words "cause of action," in sect 2 of the Code of 1859 This section was therefore very considerably modified in the Code of 1877, res judicata being made applicable to issues, and the identity of the cause of action being replaced by that of matter in issue The effect of this was to provide for an estoppel against defendants the words "suit or issue" being effective to estop a defendant from defence as well as a plaintiff from attack (2) Another material alteration made was the express extension of the doctrine of res judicata with certain limitations to foreign judgments, the limitations being enacted by sect 14 (3)

In the rule of res judicata, as enacted in 1877, only two alterations were, prior to the present Code, made which were to a great extent of a verbal character One of such alterations was to make that clear which had been previously decided namely, that the competency of jurisdiction in regard to the Court trying the former suit was as to the subsequent suit also The section even in its final form under the last Code was not complete or exhaustive of the effect of res judicata, (4) which, as a principle, exists independently of the Statute enacting it (5) It did not, for instance, deal with judgments in rem, nor with that of parties represented by, though not claiming under, the parties to the former suit (6) In fact, as observed by Sir Whitley Stokes the question of res judicata is a subject of which the importance in a country inhabited by a litigious population is only equalled by the difficulty of dealing with it clearly, concisely, and accurately in a legislative enactment (7) The same remarks apply to the present Code (8) In the Bill as first drafted an attempt was made to elaborately and exhaustively formulate the rule This arrangement was simplified by the Select Committee which considered that draft The framers of the present draft considered that even this modified attempt to make a complete statement of the rule of res judicata was words "directly and substantially." The draft Bill contained the following explanation: "If etc several issues are put in issue and tried or decided in one suit and the decision of each of such issues is material to the disposal of the suit each such issue shall be deemed to have been directly or substantially in issue in each suit." This explanation it was suggested should be added to make it clear that where in a former case several points have been involved the finding on each of which is independently sufficient to dispose of the case each of such findings is res judicata. It adopted the decision of the Calcutta High Court in Perry Mohun Muljerjee v. Ambika Churn Bandyopadhyaya (2). It has however been omitted.

The bar is absolute against all parties, the test of res judicata being mutuality (3). Where it exists the original cause of action is gone, and can only be restored by getting rid of the res judicata (4). Therefore in such case a decree holder must obtain satisfaction of his decree by execution and not by another suit, which cannot be brought either on the original cause of action, or, save in special cases on the decree in which that cause has become merged. The object of the Legislature has been to prevent continued litigation on the same grounds, and this would obviously be defeated by allowing a decree holder to abstain from putting his decree in force, and proceed again on the same cause as before (1) A plea of res judicata must be based on the grounds of the decision actually stated in the judgment (2) If a judgment be improperly obtained, so that it never ought to have been signed, when set aside it ought to be treated as never having existed So judgment obtained against a dead man cannot operate as res judicata in a subsequent suit (3)

“Court.”—The term, in so far as it is used in connection with the subsequent suit, means a Court governed by the Code From the provisions of sect 14 it is shown that the operation of the section is not confined to decrees passed by British Indian Courts (4) The word “Court,” therefore as used in connection with the previous suit, includes a foreign Court, and the Court of competent jurisdiction, which is referred to in the first paragraph, includes a foreign competent Court, (5) the recognition of a foreign judgment as res judicata being a portion of the positive law of British India (6) Upon an issue whether the defendant in possession of a taluqa had lost title by inheritance thereto by reason of having been validly adopted out of his own family held that an award to that effect of a committee of taluqdars was not a decision by a “Court” within the meaning of this section (7)

“Try.”—This word, which means the formal method of examining and adjudicating on a matter in dispute, shows that the rule in question has nothing to do with the admissibility of a judgment in evidence and which judgment may be admissible under sects 10–44 of the Evidence Act, even where it does not fulfil the requirements of this section (8) There is a conflict as to whether the doctrine of res judicata applies only to a trial by a Court of original jurisdiction, or also to a disposal by an appellate Court The Calcutta High Court has, in the under mentioned case, (9) held in effect that a trial by an original Court only is contemplated and that the section has no application to the disposal of an appeal, and that when there is no res judicata at the time of the trial of the original suit the appellate Court is bound to decide the appeal on the merits The contrary view, however, is taken by the Allahabad (10) and Madras (11) High Courts, which have held that the rule contained in this section is not limited to the Courts of first instance but applies equally to the procedure of the first and second appellate Courts by reason of sects 107 (formerly sect 582) and 108 (formerly sect 587) respectively, and, indeed, even to miscellaneous proceedings by reason of sect 139 (formerly sect 647); and that the doctrine, so far as it relates to prohibiting the retrial of an issue, must refer, not to the date of the commencement of the litigation, but to the time when the Judge is called upon to decide the issue. The Panjab Chief Court appears to have taken the same view (1). Similarly when there were cross appeals in a suit a decision in one appeal was held to be res judicata in the other, though as the suit was the same, this section could not apply (2). The correct view is that the date, not of institution but of decision, determines the application of the principle of res judicata. See Explanation I

Suit—It would hardly be necessary to say, unless the contrary had been maintained, that criminal proceedings are not a suit, (3) and therefore no finding of a Criminal Court can be res judicata in a civil suit, both the parties to and character of the two proceedings being entirely different. Similarly it has often been held that the proceedings in the Criminal Court are not in general evidence in the Civil Court and that a Civil Court is not bound to adopt the view taken by the Criminal Court as to the oral or documentary evidence (4). The term "suit" has not been defined (5). At the same time it has been said that sect 647 (now sect. 141) shows that the law does not necessarily consider every proceeding in which there are parties, evidence, argument, and decision, to be a suit, there being proceedings other than suits and appeals (6). Proceedings therefore under the insolvency sections of the Panjab Laws Act have been held not to be a suit (7). Nor are proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act, the object and nature of which differ considerably from an ordinarily civil suit, a suit (8). Nor is an application to amend clerical or arithmetical or accidental errors in a decree, a suit, (1) nor is an application for review (2) Miscellaneous civil proceedings will be a suit when they are treated as a suit by the Legislature (3) In a proceeding upon an application for probate, the only question to be determined is whether the will is true or not It is not the province of the Court to determine any question of title with reference to the property covered by the will (4) In the last mentioned case the Court further observed "And it is noteworthy that a proceeding under the Probate and Administration Act is not a suit properly so called, but takes the form of a suit according to the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code (see sect 83) That being so, we do not see how the judgment of the Allahabad High Court could be regarded as concluding the plaintiff as to the title to the estate either under sect 13 of the Civil Procedure Code or under the general principles of res judicata" But in a recent Full Bench decision of the Bombay High Court where in a contentious proceeding for Probate a will had been held not proved and Probate refused, and the widow then brought a suit for recovery of the property of the deceased from the defendants who held it as executors under that will, it was held that since contentious proceedings for Probate must take the form (as nearly as possible) of a suit they constitute a suit within the meaning of this section and therefore the Probate judgment operated as res judicata (5) In considering upon the question of competency whether the word "suit" should be construed as including an appeal, it is held that the powers of the Court in which the suit was instituted must be looked at, and not those of the Court by which the suit was decided on appeal (6) The draft Bill made the section applicable to a suit "or other proceeding," but this suggestion has not been adopted As to this, the Special Committee in their report say, "The Committee recognized that a proceeding does not come within the language of that section but they think it better not to deal with this point in express terms for the reason that the applicability of the doctrine of res judicata to certain proceedings is not open to doubt, and they foresee that any express reference to proceedings in a crystallised definition might only lead to difficulties (L R 11 I A 37, I L R 29 C 707)"

cause of action was a separate suit. So if a suit for the recovery of one bond has been dismissed, on the ground that the bond was not repaid, the decision would be res judicata so far as the claim for that bond is concerned in a subsequent suit brought for the recovery of that and other bonds on the ground of the same repayment (1).

As regards appeals, vide ante, p. 35, note to sect. 2, sub ioc, "Decree."

It was sometimes held, before 1892, and was enacted in that year by an addition to sect. 617 (now sect. 141), that execution proceedings are not miscellaneous proceedings but proceedings in suits. But though the word "suit" includes all proceedings in execution of the decree passed in the suit, the section does not apply where the proceedings, both earlier and subsequent, are in the same suit. For the section requires that the matter should have been in issue in another separate suit, and each separate application for execution of a decree in a suit is not a separate suit (2). But though in such a case this section will not apply, a prior decision in the same suit may have binding force, depending not upon this section but upon general principles of law, otherwise there would be no end to litigation. So in the last mentioned case, which was reversed on appeal to the Privy Council, the latter held that though the matter decided was not decided in a former suit but in a proceeding, of which the application in which the orders reversed by the High Court were made was merely a continuation, yet it was as binding upon the parties and those claiming under them as an interlocutory judgment in a suit is binding upon the parties in every proceeding in that suit, or as a final judgment in a suit is binding upon them in carrying the judgment into execution. It could not, in short, be held that because the prior order was made in the same suit, what it decided remained open to contest afterwards between the parties, although if it had been made in another suit it would have been final under the former sect. 13 (3). As a fact, the bar in such cases is due to the principle which has been designated the "judgment of the case," (4) the principle which is distinct from res judicata but which in the absence of any specific name has sometimes been spoken of as res judicata as falling within the literal signification of that expression, under which a decision in a prior stage of the same civil suit or proceeding operates as a bar to a fresh decision on the same point in the subsequent stages of the same suit or proceeding (5). Thus it has been held that though an application

N. 29, the Court observed that "s. 13 of the Code, of course in terms, does not apply to a case of this kind, but as has been pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Ram Kripal v. Rupkuari the principle of res judicata applies to prevent parties raising a second time in the same suit, or in the same execution proceedings an issue which in that suit or in the execution proceedings in the suit, had been previously determined. As however, is pointed out, post, the principle is really a different one from res judicata, though sometimes spoken of by that name. See Gulab Koor v. Badshah Bahadur, 13 C. W. N. 1197 (1909).

for amendment of a decree (under sect 152) is not a suit within the meaning of these sections, yet (when it has been disposed of) a subsequent application will be barred upon general principles of Law (1) Res judicata, on the other hand, applies to cases in which the decision was made or the point decided arose, in another suit or in proceedings taken in execution of a decree in another suit. Where there is a trial of a suit, and a point has been decided in an execution proceeding in a former suit, or vice versa, then the rule of res judicata may apply (2). It is, however, to be noted, that it has been said (3) that it is only certain descriptions of orders passed in the course of the execution of a decree that have operation by way of res judicata, and not every order passed in execution. There will in some cases not be res judicata, as all its conditions may not have been fulfilled (4). Res judicata will not apply when the decree, with regard to which a question arises, is really different from that with reference to which it had arisen before,

(2) In Manjunath v Venkatesh, 6 B 54, 60, et al (1881), the Court considered that the A II C in Ruknar v Ramkripal 3 A 141 (1880) had put too narrow a construction on the word 'suit' in excluding execution proceedings. In Dinkar Ballal v Hari Shirdhar, 14 B 206, 209 (1889) Scott, J., said "Moreover the previous proceeding was not an independent suit, but a proceeding in execution, and although a decision in such a proceeding is binding in subsequent proceedings in the same suit, it is a matter of doubt whether they affect claims in independent suits. The learned Judge, however, stated that it was under the circumstances not necessary to examine that question. Jardine, J., appears to have held that an order in execution proceedings in one suit could not be res judicata in another suit, though the decision in the case turned upon another point. There can, however, it is submitted, be no room for contention after the amendment of s 647 in 1892, with respect to execution proceedings, and that there will be res judicata provided the conditions of that rule have been fulfilled, which may often be not the case having regard to the nature of the order passed in execution proceedings in the former suit. See cases in following notes.

(3) Gourmani v Jagut Chandra Audhukari, 17 C 67, 63 (1889).

(4) So in Abedoonissa v Amceroonissa, 1 I A 66 (1876), the Court in the prior suit was held incompetent to try the particular issue, in Dinkar v Hari, 14 B 206 (1889), the subject matter was held not to be the same and that the conclusiveness given to s 283 of the last Code exists only as regards the particular property in dispute. So also the decisions in Gourmani v Jagut Chandra, 17 C 57 (1889), Ram Lal v Narain 12 A 533 (1890), Sheik Budan v Ram Chandra, 11 B 537 (1887) turned on the point decided not having been adjudicated upon in the former execution proceedings, the objection in the Calcutta case having been raised by the judgment debtor not in his character as such under the decree but in a different character. See Ashfaq v Gauri P, 33 A 266, 271 (1911). And see post.

as the matter in issue in the two cases will be different. So a decree directing periodical payments has for its purpose been deemed to be a separate decree in regard to each of such payments (1). And a decree confirmed in appeal has also been deemed to be different from what it was before the confirmation, and a dismissal of an application for the execution of the original decree has been held to be no bar to an application for execution of the appellate decree (2).

"Issue"—The principle of res judicata applies both to the trial of suits and the trial of issues. A suit ends in a dismissal or a decree in whole or in part. An issue ends in a finding, and the rule contained in the section enacts that not only is a suit which has once been tried and determined not again maintainable, but an issue which has once been directly and substantially raised and decided cannot be litigated a second time—the principle upon which the rule is based applying equally to issues as to suits (3).

The first clause of the section is not well constructed. It would be clearer if it ran, "No Court shall try any issue which, or any suit in which, the matter directly and substantially in issue has been," etc (4). The trial of a subsequent suit will be barred only if the matter is directly and substantially in issue in it (vide ante, first paragraph). An issue is said to arise "when a proposition of law or fact, which a plaintiff must allege in order to show a right to sue, is affirmed by the one party and denied by the other. And see Explanations III and IV (5).

There is nothing in the Code to restrict the application of the rule of res judicata to issues of fact as distinct from issues of law. In the original draft Bill it was proposed to affirm the view that a pure finding of law might operate as res judicata, but to limit the operation of the principle to adjudications on the merits, with a view to excluding, for instance, dismissals on a preliminary question of jurisdiction. Apparently it was considered that this was a matter which should be left to the Courts to determine. It has been said that a point of law can never be res judicata (6). But it is submitted that the rule thus broadly stated is not sound. It is difficult, however, to reconcile the decisions on the point.

The principle of res judicata does not depend for its application upon the question whether the decision which is to be used as a bar was a right decision or a wrong decision in law or in facts and it is immaterial whether the decree set up as a bar was rightly or wrongly passed in law or in fact (7). It is obvious that if this were not so there would be no finality for in all cases the previous decision might be challenged for error. The force of res judicata attaching to a decision by a Court on an issue of law will not be affected, even if the decision is subsequently disapproved by a Full Bench of the High Court to which that Court is subordinate (1). Where the question is one not purely of law, but of mixed law and fact, there will be res judicata. In such case the law has been applied to a particular state of facts, and if these facts come again in issue in another suit, the judgment on these facts, whether it rightly or wrongly applies the law, is res judicata (2). So where in a previous suit a particular stipulation, contained in a particular kabuliat, had been held to be valid as between the parties, it was held not open to the Court subsequently to try the issue, whether that particular stipulation was valid or not, the question being a mixed question of law and fact and whether the previous decision was or was not erroneous (3). It has been recently held that though where the question is one of law the judgment is res judicata where the parties seek to litigate again on the same cause of action, yet where the dispute relates to matters which had formed a subsidiary consideration in the former suit, though the causes of action in the suits may be different, the application of this principle is limited to matters distinctly put in issue and determined in the former suit and to questions of fact or mixed questions of fact and law (4). The Madras High Court has held that a Court is precluded from inquiry into the soundness of the law of the previous decision in respect of the precise subject matter or immediate purpose of that suit, but that provided the decision in the latter suit does not in any way question the correctness of the former decree or in any way affect its operation, an erroneous decision on a question of law in a previous suit is no bar (5). The operation of a decree as res judicata, so far at any rate as the subject matter of a direct adjudication contained in the decree is concerned, can in no way be affected, in the absence of fraud or collusion, by the fact that the suit was the result of a mistake of law, or that the decree proceeded on such mistake. The remedy, if any, in such a case can only be by way of review, and not by separate suit for relief on the ground of mistake (6).

As regards a question of pure law, it has been said that anomalous results might arise if an erroneous decision on a pure question of law in a previous suit is held to operate as res judicata in a subsequent suit relating to a different subject matter, for an erroneous decision might have the effect of altering the law applicable as between the parties. Though the language of this section may perhaps make it apply to such a case, it is very doubtful whether it was intended to have such application (1). It has been submitted that the facts decided in the first suit cannot be disputed, and for the purpose of the conclusiveness of those facts, but no further, the law applied must be accepted. Thus if a decree in a suit to declare a mortgage invalid proceed upon the constitutionality of a statute the parties afterwards cannot deny the validity of the statute in question, when the mortgagee attempts to foreclose. It could hardly be true that they could not raise the question again in a suit upon a different subject matter (2). A previous construction of law between the parties it has been held (3) ought not to be followed after that law has been replaced by another. So a decision upon a point of limitation given when either Act XIV of 1859 or Act IX of 1871 was in force, and which was subsequently held to be erroneous, was also held not to be res judicata in a suit which was brought when the present Limitation Act was in force (4). In a recent case in the Calcutta High Court where after the preliminary decree in a mortgage and before the final decree the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act was extended to the district in which the property was situate it was held that the sale was forbidden by that Act and the judgment debtor was not estopped from bringing this to the notice of the Court (5).

The matter directly and substantially in issue in the second suit or issue must be the same matter which was directly and substantially in issue in a former suit—The former judgment is conclusive only upon the same matter (6). Where causes of action are different the principle

'It was no doubt with a view to elucidating the subject that the Legislature, in enacting Act X of 1877, discarded the term 'cause of action' The question chiefly to be considered is whether the matter decided in the previous suit was in substance part of the cause of action in the second suit, and the matter cannot be said to have been determined in the previous suit, unless it was put in issue and directly determined Caspersz, op cit 329 [and see Rajah of Pittapur v Sri Rajah Row Buchi Sittaya Garu L R 12 I A 16 20 (1884)] The term cause of action is not used in the present section It, however, occurs in some other sections—20 O II rr 2 4, 3, 6 The term "right to sue" has been substituted in some sections—O XII rr 1-3 The expression 'cause of action' has been frequently construed by the Privy Council [Soorjomonee Dysee v Suddanand Mohapatra 12 B L R 315 (1873) Krishna Behari Roy v Brojeswari Choudhuran, L J. 2 I A 285 (1875), Rajah of Pittapur v Sri Rajah Row supra *Rajah of Pittapur v Sri Rajah Venkata Mahipati Surya I. each particular case (1) The rule is that where a final decree is couched in general terms, the extent to which it ought to be regarded as res judicata can only be determined by ascertaining what were the real matters of controversy in the cause (2) The leading principles of res judicata were thus enunciated by Sir William de Grey in the Duchess of Kingston's case (3) "From the variety of cases relative to judgments being given in evidence in civil suits, these two deductions seem to follow as generally true. first, that the judgment of a Court of concurrent jurisdiction, directly upon the point, is, as a plea, a bar, or as evidence, conclusive, between the same parties, upon the same matter, directly in question in another Court, secondly, that the judgment of a Court of exclusive jurisdiction, directly upon the point, is, in like manner, conclusive upon the same matter, between the same parties coming incidentally in question in another Court, for a different purpose But neither the judgment of a concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which came collaterally in question, though within their jurisdiction, nor of any matter incidentally cognizable, nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment" (4) Provided the immediate subject of the decision be not withdrawn from its operation so as to defeat the direct object of the decision, the parties may litigate matters incidentally or collaterally in issue between them for any other purpose as to which they may come in question The test applicable is whether the question decided in the previous suit was in substance part of the cause of action, or whether it was only ancillary to the main cause (5) The cases upon this branch of the rule of res judicata may be divided into two classes (6) (a) The class of cases in which it has been held that the matter directly and substantially in issue in the second suit or in an issue in such second suit, was, not directly and substantially, but collaterally or incidentally, dismissing the suit upon findings which fall short of going to the very root of the title upon which the claim rests cannot operate as res judicata but if such previous judgment does negative the title itself, the plaintiff cannot re-agitate the same question of title by suing to obtain relief for a subsequent item of the obligation (1). The plaintiff cannot re-agitate the same question of liability upon the pure and simple incident that the subject-matter of the latter suit is geographically distinct from the subject-matter of the previous suit (2) or that the suits related to different years (3). A decree which has been made without jurisdiction cannot work an estoppel by judgment (4). Upon the question as to what may be looked to in order to see what has been in issue in a previous suit and what has been actually decided the rule to be gathered from the case law is (5) that although the decree in a former suit operates as res judicata, the decree is to be construed with reference to the pleadings, (6) judgment (7) and the record (8) in order to see what was in issue, and that even the acts of the parties immediately after the decree are very important to fix the meaning of indefinite terms in it (9). One of the criteria of the identity of two suits in considering a plea of res judicata is to inquire whether the same evidence would support them both (1) "At one time the test applied to discover whether a finding was incidental or not was the fact of its being embodied in, or excluded from, the decree, and many cases appear to have been expressly decided upon this ground. Two propositions however, appear to be well settled (a) that the decree itself is not the test of what is or is not res judicata, but that the question in each case is, What did the Court really decide? Res judicata, in other words, is matter of substance, (2) (b) that where the decree of a Court is not based upon a finding, but is in spite of it (3) such a finding cannot work an estoppel" (4) A finding in a judgment to operate as res judicata, the Court being a Court of jurisdiction competent to try the subsequent suit, must be material and necessary to support the precise and particular ground or grounds on which the decree, or some operative part of it, was made, otherwise the finding must be considered either as superseded by the decree or as entirely immaterial or as no more than incidental and subsidiary to the main question in the suit, although in the latter case the finding may have been necessary to the decision of the suit. A matter cannot be said to be "directly and substantially in issue," unless and until it is or becomes material for the decision of the suit to find as to it (5) There is no such thing as constructive estoppel. The question is not whether the previous judgment was right, but whether it finally decided the matter in issue (6) The fact that the reasoning upon which a former judgment was based was equally applicable to the second case has been held (7) not to give the former judgment the force of res judicata in the second case. The rejection of applications to set aside an ex parte decree under O IX r 13 (formerly sect 103), post and sale in execution thereof under O XXI r 89 (formerly sect 311) post, relate only to specific matters in that suit, and is therefore no bar to a fresh suit to set aside the decree on the ground that the whole suit was fraudulent (8) The finding of a Criminal Court is not of course, res judicata in a civil action and no fact found or proved in a Criminal Court is on that account to be taken to be proved in a Civil Court (vide ante, "Suit")

judicata, it is not sufficient merely that an issue on the same point should have been raised in the former suit, although that issue may have been incidentally decided, but it must appear that the matter referred to was alleged by one party, and either denied, or admitted expressly or impliedly, by the other, (1) and the issue must further have been a material one (2) Matter not put in question by the parties, and not necessary to the adjudication of the subject-matter of the suit, is immaterial, and any observation of the Court thereupon is obiter dictum, which can have no effect in any other litigation (3) The rule of English law, that where the allegation on record is uncertain there is no res judicata, is also the rule embodied in this section "If a thing be not directly and precisely alleged, it shall be no estoppel" That rule is reproduced in this explanation (4) Matter alleged in the written statements of the parties may in subsequent proceedings be relevant as an admission, but it will not operate as an estoppel, unless, being admitted or denied, and found in favour of the person alleging it, it forms the basis of judicial decision (5)

only incidental and not a matter directly and substantially in issue in the suit. The addition, however, has apparently been considered unnecessary. It has been held that if the effect of a decision in a suit is necessarily inconsistent with a defence which ought to have been raised (but was not raised) that defence must under this section be deemed to have been finally decided against the defendant who ought to have raised it (1).

Explanation V.—According to the provisions of this Explanation, any relief claimed in the plaint, which is not expressly granted by the decree, shall, for the purpose of the section, be deemed to have been refused (2). The legal effect of this Explanation is that of treating the omission to grant the relief asked for in the plaint as equivalent to an express refusal, and the claim thereto in a fresh suit as res judicata (3). This Explanation refers to relief applied for, which the Court is bound to grant with reference to the matters directly and substantially in issue (4). The words “relief claimed” apply only to something which forms part of the “claim” strictly so called, that is, something which the plaintiff may claim as of right, something included in his cause of action and which if he establishes his cause of action the Court has no discretion to refuse. They do not include something which the plaintiff cannot in the suit claim as of right, but can only claim in the sense of an appeal to the discretion of the Court and which the Court may refuse in the exercise of its discretion on grounds of general expediency or otherwise even if the cause of action is fully established (5). Even if the suit as regards the relief claimed has been wrongly dismissed, the plaintiff cannot sue again for the same relief (6). The Explanation does not apply where the Court is silent on a head of relief only claimed as ancillary to the main relief, and which by implication is rather granted than refused. It only applies where the Court is silent on an independent head of relief claimed and duly controverted (7). A decree cannot be superseded by the mere omission of the Court executing the decree to pass orders on a claim made under it (8).

The former suit must have been a suit between the same parties or between parties under whom they or any of them claim, litigating under the same title.—This is an application of the principle contained

he is bound to bring before the Court all grounds of attack available to him with reference to the title which is made the ground of action (1) The question what is a different title is one of great practical difficulty, and must be decided upon the circumstances of each case separately (2) All that this Explanation enjoins is that every ground which could and ought to have been urged in support of the claim actually made in the suit, shall be deemed to have been adjudicated upon therein, whether it was actually urged or not (3) This Explanation applies only to cases in which the plaintiff, having on a former occasion sued for certain relief on the strength of one title, afterwards claims the same relief on the ground of another title, of which he might have availed himself in the former suit. It does not apply to cases where the subject matters of the two suits are different, (4) nor to cases where no relief was asked for or granted as against the particular person in the former suit though he was a party to it (5) The word "might" presupposes that the claim to be barred must be within the knowledge of the person during the first suit (6) It was proposed to add to this Explanation the words "and to have been heard and finally decided so far as the subject matter of the former suit was concerned and no further," which was stated to be intended to meet such cases as rent suits, in which, unless the question of title is expressly raised, such question is only incidental and not a matter directly and substantially in issue in the suit. The addition, however, has apparently been considered unnecessary. It has been held that if the effect of a decision in a suit is necessarily inconsistent with a defence which ought to have been raised (but was not raised) that defence must under this section be deemed to have been finally decided against the defendant who ought to have raised it (1).

Explanation V—According to the provisions of this Explanation, any relief claimed in the plaint, which is not expressly granted by the decree, shall, for the purpose of the section, be deemed to have been refused (2). The legal effect of this Explanation is that of treating the omission to grant the relief asked for in the plaint as equivalent to an express refusal, and the claim thereto in a fresh suit is res judicata (3). This Explanation refers to relief applied for, which the Court is bound to grant with reference to the matters directly and substantially in issue (4). The words "relief claimed" apply only to something which forms part of the "claim" strictly so called, that is, something which the plaintiff may claim as of right, something included in his cause of action and which if he establishes his cause of action the Court has no discretion to refuse. They do not include something which the plaintiff cannot in the suit claim as of right, but can only claim in the sense of an appeal to the discretion of the Court and which the Court may refuse in the exercise of its discretion on grounds of general expediency or otherwise even if the cause of action is fully established (5). Even if the suit as regards the relief claimed has been wrongly dismissed, the plaintiff cannot sue again for the same relief (6). The Explanation does not apply where the Court is silent on a head of relief only claimed as ancillary to the main relief, and which by implication is rather granted than refused. It only applies where the Court is silent on an independent head of relief claimed and duly controverted (7). A decree cannot be superseded by the mere omission of the Court executing the decree to pass orders on a claim made under it (8).

The former suit must have been a suit between the same parties or between parties under whom they or any of them claim, litigating under the same title—This is an application of the principle contained in the maxim, res inter alios acta alteri nocere non debet, what is transacted between one set of persons ought not to injure or affect another person. Judgments and decrees only bind parties and privies (1). A person who is no party to a decree is not bound by it (2). "Parties," in the larger legal sense, are all persons having a right to control the proceedings, to make defence, to adduce and cross-examine witnesses, and to appeal from the decision, if an appeal lies, and it may be added, those who assume such a right. The only extension given to this rule by Indian Courts is that a decree against a benamidar binds also the beneficial owner, in which case the parties are the same in fact though not in name (3). If the verdict were not required to be between the same parties, a man might be bound by a decision who had not the liberty to cross examine, and it is contrary to natural justice that a man should be injured by a determination that he or those under whom he claims were not at liberty to controvert (4). Except in the case of judgments in rem, (5) and judgments relating to matters of a public nature, (6) which are governed by a different principle, no person is bound by a decision unless he or those under whom he claims were parties to the proceedings in which it was given (7). But it is reasonable that the same set of persons, or persons claiming under them, should be bound by previous proceedings concerning the same matter. There is no hardship in holding that a man shall be bound by that which would have bound those under whom he claims quoad the subject matter of the claim, for he who feels the advantage, ought also to feel the burden (qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus) and no man can, save in certain cases excepted by the Statute law and the law merchant, transfer to another a better right than he himself possesses (8). Persons other than the parties to a suit have been divided (9) into three classes, with reference to their position as affected by the judgment —

(a) Persons who claim under the parties to the former suit, or in the language of English law, privies to those parties (10)

(10) In the law of a complete person he comes privy of another, (1) by succeeding to the position of that other as regards the subject of the estoppel, e.g., an assignee or grantee, (2) by holding in subordination to that other, e.g., the case of a landlord and tenant. The ground of privity is property not personal relation. To make a man privy to an action he must have acquired an interest in the subject matter of the action either by inheritance, succession, or purchase from a party subsequently to the action or he must hold property subordinately. Thus an assignee is not estopped by a judgment against the assignor obtained after the assignment. Bigelow on Estoppel 5th ed 142 144. A person is said to claim under another when he derives his title through that other by assignment or otherwise. Samir Lal v Chhatar Mal 23 A 1, 3 (1906). A privity exists between an execution creditor and a

(f) Persons who, though not claiming under the parties to the former suit, were represented by them therein (1) Such are persons interested in the estate of a testator or intestate, in relation to the executor or administrator, shareholders in a company, (2) in relation to the registered officer of that company, and in India, members of a joint and undivided family in relation to a member who has sufficiently represented their interests in a former suit (3)

(c) Strangers, who are neither privies to nor represented by the parties to the former suit

The general rule is that in the absence of fraud, (1) an adjudication is binding upon the parties to a suit or persons claiming under or represented by them, but upon these only. It must be shown that the party in the former suit represented the interest claimed in the latter suit. A party represents all interests owned by him at the time of the action or subordinate to his, though belonging to others. A decision against him will bind interests acquired by him subsequently, and all subordinate interests represented by him whensoever acquired (5) The nature and object of the former suit must be regarded in order to ascertain who was really and substantially the litigant (6) When once it is made clear that the self same right and title is substantially in issue in two suits the precise form in which either suit was brought, or the fact that the plaintiff in the one case was the defendant in the other is immaterial (7) And the fact that there are other parties introduced in the subsequent litigation does not alter the case—their toppling substitutes between the parties who were parties to the former litigation (8) But there is no res judicata where the subsequent decision is not between the parties or those claiming under them (9) The decision in a suit by one of two zemindars against the other as to the right to the profit rental of a bazaar was held by the Privy Council not to be res judicata in a subsequent suit for possession of a share of the bazaar, in which suit all the parties, plaintiff, and defendants, claimed under the plaintiff in the former suit. Such a plea, however, might well be a defence to a hostile claim by persons asserting a title under the defendant zemindar in the former suit, against their claiming under the plaintiff zemindar in that suit (1). A decision of a material issue in a suit against one who is the representative of an estate, bars a suit by the true owner on the same issue (2). And a representative of the person is bound by a decree against the person whom he represents, but it is essential that there should be an adjudication as to the fact that he is representative (3). A verdict against a man suing in one capacity will not estop him when he sues in another distinct capacity, and, in fact, is a different person (4). The principle of res judicata has no application in a dispute between parties all of whom claim under the person in whose favour the decision in the previous suit was given (5).

Hindu widow—A decree fairly and properly obtained against a Hindu widow, relating to her husband's estate, binds the reversionary heirs, the whole estate being for the time vested in her, absolutely for some purposes, though in some respects for a qualified interest (6). It was held under the Limitation Act of 1859, that when the widow as plaintiff sues to recover the husband's estate, held adversely to her by the defendant, a decree against her would bind the reversioner and that adverse possession, which would bar her right of suit, if she were alive, on the ground of limitation, would equally bar that of the reversioner (7). But under Article 141 of the present Act, it has been decided that a reversioner who succeeds to immovable property has twelve years to bring his suit for possession from the time when his estate falls into appellant having been a party to a former suit, in which the respondent obtained a decree for possession of the estate in question as mother and heiress of the last proprietor, is barred by such decree from afterwards recovering possession, on the ground that the respondent is not such heiress. Although such decree barred the appellant from setting up in this suit a family custom for the purpose of showing that he was entitled to possession during the life of the respondent, he is not thereby debarred from showing that upon her death, if he survives, he will be entitled, under such custom, to succeed her, and therefore to have a certain deed executed by her declared illegal and inoperative after her death (1)

Benamidar.—Where the parties are parties in fact, although not in name, as in the case of a person who buys an estate for himself, but has it conveyed benami in the name of another, a decree properly obtained by or against the benamidar is binding upon the real owner, the presumption being that the benamidar instituted the suit with his authority and consent (2)

Co-defendants—Where it was broadly contended that there would be no res judicata, as between co defendants, it was held that such contention was incorrect. Section 11 does not preclude the decisions upon any issue from operating as res judicata, merely because the issue is raised as between co defendants, if the matter was directly and substantially in issue in a former suit, and the other necessary conditions are satisfied. The words “between the same parties” in this section, qualify not only the words “former suit” but the whole expression “in issue in a former suit.” Therefore an issue raised and decided as between co defendants in a former suit may be res judicata in a subsequent suit, in which they are urged as plaintiff and defendant (3). When the same parties were contending in the former suit, in fact though not in form, as where they were co defendants on the record, but their interests were different, and there was an issue between them which was decided, its decision is a bar to a second suit or defence raising the same issue between them, when in the position of plaintiff and defendant (4). cause of action for the injured party in the case of either a joint contract or a joint tort, and that cause of action is exhausted and satisfied by a judgment being obtained by the plaintiff against all or any of the joint contractors or joint wrongdoers whom he chooses to sue (1) But the rule is otherwise where there is a joint and several liability, a decree against one of several joint and several promisors without satisfaction will not bar a second suit (2) And in the under-mentioned case a decision in a suit against a banian was held not to be res judicata in a suit for the same money against a manager, the liability not being joint but being based on distinct contracts (3) Conversely, where a plaintiff has failed in a suit against one of several joint debtors, a judgment recovered by one of such debtors cannot be pleaded as a defence to a subsequent action against the other joint debtors in respect of the same cause, unless the plea shows that the judgment was recovered on a ground which operated as a discharge of all (4) It has however, been more recently held by the Allahabad High Court that the effect of sect 43 of the Contract Act being to exclude the right of a joint contractor to be sued along with his co contractors, the rule laid down in King v Hoare, and Kendall v Hamilton supra is no longer applicable to cases arising in India at all events in the Mofussil since the passing of that Act, and a judgment obtained against some only of the joint contractors and remaining unsatisfied is no bar to a second suit on the contract against the other joint contractors (5)

Father of joint Hindu family—Where the Hindu son in a joint family becomes entitled by reason of his birth and in his own right a right which he can enforce against his father he does not claim under him within the meaning of this section (6) Therefore the dismissal of a suit for redemption of a mortgage of joint family property brought by the father in a joint Hindu family alone was held not a bar to a subsequent suit for redemption by the sons, inasmuch as their title was not through their father, but was separate and independent (7) The question whether a Hindu father in a particular suit, in which he alone of the family is a party, represents his co parcenors is a question to be decided with reference to the circumstances of the case Held therefore, under the circumstances of the case, that an erroneous decree in ejectment obtained against a Hindu father was not res judicata in a subsequent suit by the son for recovery of the holding (1) An auction purchaser of the right of a Hindu father in joint property cannot raise the plea that a mortgage was made without legal necessity as long as there is still time for the sons to challenge the purchase (2) The obligation of a Hindu son to pay his father's debt is not an obligation which he had incurred jointly with his father, and the creditor's cause of action against the father and the son is not a single cause of action which is exhausted upon a decree being obtained against one of them only. A judgment recovered, against his father only, does not therefore bar a suit against the son (3) Where the plaintiff had sued the defendant's father for a declaration of his right to a share of property, which he claimed as ancestral property governed by Mitakshara law, and had obtained a decree, the defendant's father's plea of a custom of primogeniture being rejected, it was held in a subsequent suit by the plaintiff for partition of the property that the defendant (who had not been a party to the former suit) was barred from pleading a custom of primogeniture (4)

Manager of same—The manager of a joint Hindu family suing or being sued acts in a representative capacity. He can execute decrees on behalf of the joint family and receive payments and give receipts which will be binding on it (5) Where, therefore, the interest of a joint and undivided family being in issue, one member of the family prosecuted or defended a suit, such a decree may afterwards be considered as binding upon all the members of the family, their interest being sufficiently represented in the suit, (6) and the presumption being that he is acting for the family, unless it were made out that he acted and professed to act for himself alone (7) In defining, however, the relation of the managing member to the joint family and estate we are brought into contact with a relationship which has no counterpart in English law, neither the term partner nor principal, nor agent, nor even co parccner will strictly apply (8)

Karnavan—The karnavan or managing member of a Malabar tarwad (family) is in a similar position to a Hindu father under the Mitakshara law. And a decree against him may in some cases bind the members (9) It was, however, later held by a Full Bench reviewing the preceding cases that a decree in a suit in which the karnavan of a nambudri illom or marumakkattayam tarwad is, in his representative capacity, joined as a defendant, and which he honestly defends, is binding upon the other members of the family not actually made parties (1)

Shebait—Where a shebait has incurred debts in the service of an idol, for the benefit and preservation of its property, his position is analogous to that of a manager for an infant heir, (2) and decrees properly obtained against him in respect of debts so incurred are binding upon succeeding shebait. For if such debts and the judgments founded upon them were not held to be thus binding on successors, the consequence would be that no shebait would be able to obtain assistance in times of need (3)

Managers Guardians—In the case cited below, (4) the decision of a Forest Settlement Officer, upon an inquiry held under the Boundary Act of 1860, at which inquiry the plaintiff, then a minor, was represented by a manager of his estate appointed under sect 8 of Regulation V of 1804, was held to be res judicata in a suit to recover the land. A manager of an estate, who has obtained a certificate under Act XL of 1858, is the guardian of infant co-proprietors, and represents them fully in suits for money advanced in reference to the estate (5). The fact that the plaintiff, a minor, had through his guardian actively intervened in proceedings to set aside a sale of property in which he and his father were jointly interested as members of a Mitakshara family, was held to be no bar to a suit to recover the property the purchaser having at the sale required the interest of the father only (6)

Minor—To maintain the plea of res judicata it must appear that the person whose interest it is sought to bind was in some way a party to the suit. An intention that a suit should be for the benefit of a minor is insufficient. The minor must be properly represented in it (7). A decree passed against an infant properly represented is binding upon him like a decree passed against an adult, but it is open to the infant to impeach such decree by a separate suit in cases where his guardian has been guilty of fraud or negligence in allowing the decree to be passed against him (1) It is only where fraud or negligence is proved on the part of the guardian of a minor that the right to bring a suit to set aside a previous decision can be claimed by a minor or his administrator, where no fraud or negligence is proved a previous decision will operate as a bar (2)

Mortgagor—The acts of a mortgagor prior to the mortgage bind his mortgagee, (3) but his acts subsequent to the mortgage do not, so that a suit by the mortgagor subsequent to his mortgage, and not brought at the instance or with the concurrence of the mortgagee, does not bind the latter (4) The proprietor of an estate cannot be said to represent the whole estate after he has mortgaged it (5) A decree obtained by the mortgagees against the original mortgagors, the vendors of the appellants, was held to be no evidence against the appellants, purchasers of the interests of the mortgagors, if they were no parties to that decree, and if the transfer to them was before the institution of the suit in which that decree was passed, and the purchasers were in no way bound by the result of that suit (6) Where a mortgagor obtained a decree for redemption, which was not executed, and subsequently sold the equity of redemption to the plaintiff, who sued the mortgagee for redemption, it was held that the suit was not barred by the former decree as the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee had not been terminated, and the right to redeem was inseparable from the relation as long as it existed (7)

Lessor and Lessee—A lessee claims under his lessor, but a lessor does not claim under his lessee, so that a decision in a suit by the lessee to eject a stranger does not bar a suit by the lessor against the same person with the same object (8) So also decrees obtained against the registered tenants of a tenure were held inadmissible in evidence against the real owner of the tenure, who was not a party to the suits obtained, and who did not claim through the parties against whom the decrees were passed (1) And a suit by a lessor against a ranyat to set aside a pottah is not barred by the fact that the pottah has been declared genuine in a suit by the plaintiff's ticcadar against the same defendant (2) Where two persons each claim title to land in the possession of a tenant, and one of them sues the tenant for rent in a competent Court, and the other intervenes and claims title, and the issue is contested and finally decided that the tenant should pay his rent to one of them, the title cannot be contested in a subsequent suit between the two claimants (3) A decree obtained in a previous suit for rent by an iyadar does not operate against the tenant as res judicata on the question whether the relation of land lord and tenant exist in a subsequent suit for rent brought by the superior landlord (4) As to suits for the recovery of cesses (5) and rents, see cases also below (6) On dismissal of a suit for rent on denial of relationship of landlord and tenant, the plaintiff may sue again for ejectment, (7) though where the tenant sets up his own title to the land, the decision on the issue of title may be res judicata (8)

Partition—The right to enforce it is a legal incident of a joint tenancy, and as long as such tenancy subsists so long may any of the joint tenants apply to Court for partition (9)

Different titles—The words "litigating under the same title" do not refer to the identity of the ground of action, but mean that the question must have been raised and decided in the same right that is to say in the right of the parties to the second suit and not in the right of any other person Thus if one is made defendant in an official capacity the judgment will not bind him personally, and vice versa. A plaintiff suing as next heir to his uncle was held not barred by a decision against his father, inasmuch as he claimed under a title not derived from his father (10) A suit against an elder brother for maintenance was held not to be barred by a previous order made upon other grounds dismissing a claim for maintenance against the father The adjudication in the previous suit was not between the brothers, but between the plaintiff and his father, and was based upon a different sort of claim (1) A suit by persons representing the public is not barred by a decision in a previous suit by the same plaintiff in their individual and private capacity (2) In a previous suit in which plaintiff had been a party it had been attempted to assert plaintiff's title to a piece of land occupied by the defendants by proving that they held the same by virtue of an alleged specific lease The Court had held that no such lease had been executed Plaintiff now claimed the land as belonging to his devasan, and sued to recover it on the strength of his title, he also set up the alleged lease once more Held that though the question of the validity of the lease was res judicata, plaintiff was at liberty to sue also on the strength of his title, independently of the lease and he was not estopped from so suing by the fact that the former suit had been based upon the lease alone (3) A claim on a lanam is a claim arising ex contractu, while a claim on title against a trespasser is founded on tort (4)

Miscellaneous—The purchaser of land at a sale by the Government for the recovery of arrears of revenue under the sale laws buys free of encumbrances, and is therefore not bound by the decision in a suit brought by or against the former owner (5) It has been held in Madras that a priest of a temple as the representative of a former priest, is bound by a decree in a suit brought by the latter to establish his right to damages for the invasion of his rights as priest (6) The co sharer of an estate cannot be bound by a decision in a suit for rent brought by another co sharer against a tenant (7) Where all the conditions prescribed by sect 11 exist the fact that in the first suit the defendant was an execution creditor and in the second he is a purchaser at an execution sale makes no difference as to the second suit being res judicata A privity exists between an execution creditor and a purchaser at a Court sale, the latter representing the former in so far as he had a right to bring the property to sale in execution of his decree (8) As to a suit by the lanam of a mitta (9) by one claiming as the dharmakarta of a devasthanam, (10) and by one of five trustees in whom the urama right over a devasan was vested, (11) see the cases noted below A judgment against one holder of service tatan lands is res judicata as regards a succeeding holder (12) A purchaser of land cannot be estopped by a judgment in a suit against his vendors commenced after the purchase (13)

lowest grade competent to try it. For instance in Bengal, by the Bengal Civil Court Act, No VI of 1871, the jurisdiction of a Munsif extends only to original suits in which the amount or value of the subject matter in dispute does not exceed Rs 1000. The qualifications of a Munsif and the authority of his judgment would not be the same as those of a District or of a Subordinate Judge, who have jurisdiction in civil suits without any limit of amount. In their Lordships' opinion, it would not be proper that the decision of a Munsif upon (for instance) the validity of a will or of an adoption in a suit for a small portion of the property affected by it should be conclusive in a suit before a District Judge or in the High Court for property of a large amount, the title to which might depend upon the will or the adoption. Other similar cases are mentioned in the judgment of the Chief Justice. It is true that there is an appeal from the Munsif's decision, but that upon the facts would be to the District Court, and not to the High Court. And that the decision should be conclusive would be still more improper as regards many other of the various Courts in India, the qualifications of whose Judges differ greatly. By taking concurrent jurisdiction to mean concurrent as regards the pecuniary limit as well as the subject matter, this evil or inconvenience is avoided, and although it may be desirable to put an end to litigation the inefficiency of many of the Indian Courts makes it advisable not to be too stringent in preventing a litigant from proving the truth of his case" (1). And the Council, in a later portion of the judgment, say, 'that by Court of competent jurisdiction, Act X of 1877 means a Court which has jurisdiction over the matter in the subsequent suit in which the decision is used as conclusive or in other words, a Court of concurrent jurisdiction'. The rule may be stated to be that the judgment in the previously decided suit must have been delivered either by a Court of exclusive or of concurrent jurisdiction upon a matter falling within such jurisdiction, and where the jurisdiction is concurrent the Court which adjudicated on the previously decided suit must have been such a Court as would have been competent to adjudicate upon the later suit. The question of whether any particular judgment is passed in the exercise of exclusive or concurrent or limited jurisdiction must depend upon the terms of the law upon which the judgment relies for its authority. It has been held that the bar of res judicata arises where the Court deciding the first suit was competent to try the same and its inability to entertain it arose not from incompetence but from the existence of another Court with a preferential jurisdiction (2).

(1) The Privy Council in Ran Bahadur Singh v. Icho Koor supra referring to the above remarks further say — If this construction of the law were not adopted the lowest Court in India might finally and without appeal to the High Court the title to the property at issue in the Indian Empire. In Hyatt v. Bhat 2 Bom. L.R. 115 (1900) the extent of the jurisdiction of the District Court in which the first suit was brought was not stated.

In Pargat Unn Katti v. M. 270 (1900) the suit was held to be res judicata for though brought in the Subordinate Judge's Court it ought to be finally decided. It has been brought in the Munsif's Court in which the previous decision had been given. Rajyoti v. Janki 4 B.L.R. 43 (1900).

It has also been held that "competent to try" means "competent to try with conclusive effect: ' (1) and that concurrence of jurisdiction must exist not only as to the original Court, but also as to the appellate tribunals and their powers in the respective suits (2) The Calcutta High Court, and later decisions in the Madras High Court, have, however, dissented from this view, holding that there was nothing in sect 12 of the last Code to indicate that the judgments in two suits must be open to appeal in the same way, in order that the decision upon any issue in the earlier suit can bar the trial of the same issue in the later one. So it was held that the decision of an issue in a suit in which no second appeal lies to the High Court bars the trial of the same issue in a subsequent suit in which such second appeal is allowed (3) And see now the new Explanation II which is intended to affirm the view that the competence of the jurisdiction of a Court does not depend on the right of appeal from its decision. The word "competent" is further to be considered with reference to the time when the suit is brought, and the jurisdiction of the Court at that period. The words of the section must be taken to mean competent to try the subsequent suit if it had been brought at the same time that the former suit was brought (4) A plaintiff cannot, however, evade the provisions of the Code by joining several causes of action against the same defendant in the subsequent suit and instituting it in a Court of superior jurisdiction (5) In a recent case in the Bombay High Court, where the defendant in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights pleaded res judicata on the ground that plaintiff had filed a previous suit, though this had been dismissed for want of jurisdiction because the leave necessary under clause 12 of the Letters Patent had not first been obtained, it was held on second appeal that the former Court had not been "competent to try" and that there was no res judicata (6)

The prevailing view as to the effect of an appealable decision is that it constitutes res judicata until appealed against, when it ceases to be such, and does not so operate again unless it is adopted by, and thus becomes the decision of, the Appellate Court (7) Where there were decrees in cross suits on the same facts, and an appeal against one decree only, it was held that the decree unappealed was no bar to the decision of the appeal (1) In a suit brought in the Agency Court at Kattiawar, relating to the villages in Kattiawar, the Court decided that there existed between the parties a custom of metap (i.e., right to an extra share by the senior member) A second suit was subsequently brought in a British Court as regards the villages belonging to the parties situate in the British territories, wherein plaintiffs alleged that the custom of metap did not exist in their family It was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that the question was res judicata, on the ground that the test of competency to try the subsequent suit was whether the suit was one which in respect of its subject matter and the valuation thereof could have been tried by the Agency Court, and that its exclusion on territorial grounds had not to be taken into account The High Court declined to accept the contention, as not being consistent with the express terms of sect 11 of the Code (2) There can be no res judicata unless the Judge who made the decree in the previous suit had jurisdiction to try and decide, not only the particular matter in issue, but also the subsequent suit itself, in which the issue is subsequently raised (3) of an inferior tribunal, to be prepared to show that the proceedings were within its jurisdiction. In the case of a Court of superior jurisdiction, the want of jurisdiction is not to be presumed.

A decree made without jurisdiction cannot operate as res judicata (1). And the consent of parties will not give to a Court a jurisdiction which it does not otherwise possess (2). But the jurisdiction of a Court to entertain and decide upon a cause of action depends upon the nature of the claim put forward by the plaintiff as his cause of action, and the matter involved in it, and does not depend upon what the defendant may assert by way of defence (3).

Such matter must have been heard and finally decided by the Court in the former suit.—In order to operate as res judicata, the matter must have been heard and finally decided. There must have been a decision upon the matter alleged to be res judicata, which finally granted or withheld the relief sought in respect thereof. "Res judicata by its very words means a matter upon which the Court has exercised its judicial mind, and has come to the conclusion that one side is right, and has pronounced a decision accordingly. In my opinion, res judicata signifies that the Court has, after argument and consideration, come to a decision on a contested matter" (4). These words should be read to mean "heard and finally decided" by such Court, either if no appeal is preferred from its judgment, or if an appeal being preferred has been disposed of, and the judgment of the Appellate Court, which takes the place of its judgment, has decided the point (5). "The conditions for the exclusion of jurisdiction, on the ground of res judicata, are that the same identical matter shall have come in question already in a Court of competent jurisdiction, that the matter shall have been controverted, and that it shall have been finally decided. That is just what sect. 13 requires, there must be a final decision" (6). As to judgments by consent, see post.

such as the Court making it could not alter (except on review) on the application of either party or reconsider of its own motion. Though this Explanation has been now omitted, the word "final" presumably has still the same meaning. A decision liable to appeal may be final within the meaning of this section until the appeal is made (1). It is not, however, necessary, in order to justify a plea of res judicata, to show that the first case was fully entered into and discussed, either by oral or written testimony, where no question was raised but all the parties interested declared themselves satisfied on the point, (2) and a final decree is conclusive, notwithstanding it may have proceeded upon an erroneous view of the law (3). It, however, generally speaking, follows from the rule which requires a hearing and final decision, that a finding which is inconclusive, or which is based upon technical points and which dismisses a suit for any reason not on the merits, will not operate as a bar, as where a demurrer was allowed, (4) or a suit is dismissed for misjoinder and failure to pay court-fees, (5) or improper valuation, (6) or because the permission of Government was not previously obtained, (7) or because of failure to give security for costs, (8) or on the ground of jurisdiction, (9) or non joinder of all proper parties, (10) or as against a party whose name was ordered to be expunged from the record in a former suit, (11) or where a suit has been dismissed for failure to pay the costs of service of summons on the defendants, (12) or where a suit to remove an attachment is dismissed on the ground that the attachment has already been removed, (13) or where a suit has been dismissed on the ground that it was premature, (14) or wrongly framed (15). ments of sect 11 Where in a former suit between the same parties in which the same claim upon title was made, a decree dismissed the suit, but the judgment in the former suit stated that it was left open to the plaintiff to sue again and that no matters affecting the rights of the parties were decided between them, it was held that the prior decree was not a final decision within the meaning of the Code and the defence of res judicata was not maintained (1) Where, though there has been a decision on other points, the matter of the second suit has literally not been determined in the previous suit, there can be as to it no res judicata (2) The section does not apply where the former suit is withdrawn (3) It has already been remarked that upon appeal a matter ceases to be res judicata When a matter although decided by the Court of first instance or by the lower Appellate Court, is not decided by the last Court of Appeal, it has not been heard and finally decided The fact of an appeal being in point of form dismissed is not conclusive as to every point decided by the lower Court (4) As to the effect of withdrawal from a suit, see note below (5) The dismissal of a claim after issue has been joined, because the plaintiff has failed to produce evidence to substantiate it, has the same effect as a dismissal founded upon evidence and the subject matter of such claim will be res judicata (6) A subsisting judgment on an award is as binding as any other judgment (7) As between the parties a decree arrived at after the taking of an oath on a question of fact in a case under the Oaths Act is none the less a final adjudication (8) A judgment by consent is as effective an estoppel between the parties as a judgment whereby the Court exercises its mind on a contested cause (9) And where a Court has heard and determined the case judicially, and there has been an appeal, which has been withdrawn owing to a compromise entered into by the parties, the original decision becomes a final decision and operates as a bar to a second suit (1) When a decree is passed by consent of parties, the question whether or not the compromise on which such decree is based is valid, cannot be gone into on an appeal against that decree (2) The Court, however, has jurisdiction to set aside a consent order upon any ground which would invalidate an agreement between the parties So a consent order which had been completed and acted upon but without affecting interests of third parties, was set aside by the Court on the ground of common mistake (3) The test for determining whether there is an estoppel in any particular case is whether the parties decided for themselves the particular matter in dispute and the matter was expressly embodied in the decree passed on the compromise (4) Compromises of suits by Hindu females are to be dealt with upon the principles applicable to alienations by them (5) The rulings as to the effect of ex parte and unexecuted decrees in subsequent suits (a question which has been considered principally in connection with rent suits) are conflicting (6) An ex parte decree is, when final, res judicata only so far as the decision necessarily decided an issue, but nothing more is concluded The conclusive effect is confined to the point actually decided (7) Thus an ex parte decree for rent concludes nothing more than that so much rent was due at a certain time from the tenant to his landlord, and assuming that the plaint goes no further, and makes no claim for a declaration as to the rate of the rent, the defendant having a proper opportunity to meet the case, the rate of rent is not res judicata, even although the decree may recite or declare the rate (1) Such decrees generally will be held conclusive as to all matters which shall have been heard and decided on the merits. A defendant respondent cannot avoid the application of the principle of res judicata, by saying that he did not appear at the trial of the suit, and a plaintiff who has got an ex parte decree on proof of his title or on failure of the defendant to prove a defence, the onus of proving which was on him, cannot be deprived of the full benefit of the decree which he has obtained by the fact that the defendant did not appear in court to protect his own interest (2) An ex parte decree in a suit for rent operates as res judicata upon the question of relation of landlord and tenant (3) A finding on an issue not necessary for the determination of the suit will not effect a res judicata. Where an issue is not necessary for the decision of the suit in which it is raised, the decree, couched in general terms, does not cover the finding on that issue, nor can the insertion of such finding in the decree give it the force of res judicata. The Code does not contemplate findings on issues being inserted in it, and there is no section in the Code which makes it necessary to appeal from the decree, because such finding has been inserted in it (4) A decree in a maintenance suit is not final in the sense that the rate fixed can never be altered. Altered circumstances may justify a suit for reduction of maintenance or a suit for its increase. If there be such altered circumstances a previous decision will be no bar (5) An order of the Small Cause Court, made in a proceeding under sect. 278 of the former Code, is an order made in a suit within the meaning of sect. 37 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act (XV of 1882), and as such is final (6) A possessory suit filed in the Mamlatdar's Court was dismissed by the Mamlatdar on the merits. The plaintiff thereupon filed another suit under sect. 9 of the Specific Relief Act in a Civil Court which allowed the claim and passed a decree in his favour. It being contended that the Mamlatdar's decree barred the second suit it was held that the Mamlatdar's decision was not conclusive (7) Where there are conflicting decisions, the last decision operates as a bar (8)

of clause (a) and the omission altogether of the last clause of the former section as to which, see post. A foreign judgment is a judgment of a foreign Court, as to the meaning of which term, see notes to sect 2, ante, and ante "Court". A foreign judgment may be used in two ways. It may be either pleaded by a defendant as res judicata by way of defence to the claim made against him, or a suit may be brought to enforce it. Sects 13 and 14 recognize the effect of a foreign judgment as res judicata, the latter section providing that where a foreign judgment is relied on the production of the document duly authenticated is presumptive evidence that the Court which made it had competent jurisdiction.

All judgments, whether domestic or foreign if delivered by a Court without jurisdiction are void (1). As regards competency, a question arose as to the meaning of the words "Court of jurisdiction competent to try such subsequent suit" in connection with foreign judgments. In the case of domestic judgments these words as has been already stated mean a Court having concurrent jurisdiction with the Court trying the subsequent suit whether as regards the pecuniary limit of its jurisdiction or the subject matter of the suit, to try it with conclusive effect (2). The same construction has been given also with regard to foreign judgments it being held that the mere fact that the actual (second) suit could not have been tried in the first Court did not matter, it being enough if a suit of that class could have been tried if the subject matter of it had been within the local limits of that Court's jurisdiction (3). So it has been held that the determination of an issue as to adoption in a suit brought in the Court of a Native State for the recovery of land was conclusive on that question in a suit brought in a British Indian Court for the recovery of property in British territory (4). It has however been doubted whether this decision is correct in so far as it holds that exclusion on territorial grounds is not to be taken into account, it being pointed out, with reference to the contention that otherwise Explanation VII of the former Code (now sect 14) would be deprived of all meaning, that there are many suits which are within the jurisdiction both of a foreign and domestic Court, to which that Explanation would attach (5). The existence of jurisdiction will primarily be determined with reference to the law of the country in which that Court may be situate and from the Government whereof it may derive its judicial power (6). The Courts of other countries however are not bound and generally not inclined to recognize the jurisdiction as sufficient when it is conferred or exercised against the general principles of international law (1) So in the under mentioned case (2) it was held that the Baroda Court had no jurisdiction over the defendants who were British subjects residing in British territory.

The Indian Legislature, however, while recognizing foreign judgments as res judicata, did not adopt the view of the English Courts as to their absolute conclusiveness, (3) and qualified the general rule enacted in sect 11 by a number of limitations embodied in sect 13. Res judicata, in connection with foreign judgments, is only of limited extent. Jurisdiction and the existence of the other elements common to both domestic and foreign judgments were formerly both dealt with in sect 11, but jurisdiction is now separately provided for in sect 13 (a)

The other special limitations prescribed by sect 13 in order that a foreign judgment may operate as res judicata, are—

1. It must have been given on the merits. So a judgment of dismissal of a suit, as barred by limitation will not be deemed to be on the merits and therefore to operate as res judicata, except where that law not only bars the remedy but extinguishes the right itself (4)

2 There must be no apparent mistake of International or Indian law (5) In the under mentioned case, (6) the Court relied on this clause in support of the view that the judgment of a Court having jurisdiction otherwise than in accordance with the general principles of International law would not be res judicata, but this clause has reference to the judgment itself and not to the question of jurisdiction, which is provided for in clause (a) and which must be dealt with on general principles. As appears from the words used, a mistake of fact does not bar the operation of res judicata, the judgment being a bar even though the foreign Court had come on the evidence to an erroneous conclusion as to the facts. Nor will a mistake as to the law of the country in which the judgment is passed, or of any country other than British India, affect the operation of the judgment as res judicata (7)

3 It must not be contrary to natural justice. It is never advisable to limit the meaning of wide terms intentionally used by the Legislature. The words are wide enough, it has been said, to allow of an investigation into the moral rightness of the decision, (8) though they would not permit the Court to inquire into the merits on the simple ground that the conclusion drawn from the facts was erroneous. For such a case assumes a mere error in decision and not a contrariety to natural justice. The scope of the term has, however, as a matter of general practice, been restricted to narrower limits, being used in reference rather to the conduct or mode of procedure of the foreign Court than to the merits of the particular case (1) Thus a decision passed without reasonable notice to the persons concerned is contrary to natural justice (2) This view is adopted by the amendment, that it is the proceedings leading to the judgment which are to be looked at

4 The judgment must not have been obtained by fraud All judgments whether domestic or foreign, are void if obtained by fraud or collusion (3) In the case of domestic judgments it has sometimes been held that the fraud for which they may be set aside must be extrinsic to the matter tried in the cause and not merely that consisting in false evidence or forged documents submitted to the Court (4) The rule has been held to apply to foreign judgments also (5) As regards these judgments, however, the weight of opinion appears to be in favour of the contrary view (6)

5 It must not sustain a claim founded on a breach of any law in force in British India If so, the judgment will not be enforced, even though the defect be not apparent on the face of the proceedings (7) This clause refuses recognition to every foreign judgment which recognizes a legal relation condemned in this country But it has been held that a domestic judgment is res judicata even when its effect is to sanction what is illegal in the sense of being prohibited by Statute (8)

Foreign judgments in rem stand on a footing somewhat different from that of domestic judgments in rem as well as from that of foreign judgments in personam Their recognition and enforcement is still void of express legislative sanction, as while they are beyond the rule of res judicata enunciated in these sections, there is nothing in sect 41 of the Evidence Act to directly indicate that its provisions relating to judgments in rem are to be construed so as to include foreign judgments But it is apprehended that in analogy with the practice of the English Courts such judgments given in the exercise of probate, matrimonial, admiralty, or insolvency jurisdiction will, speaking generally, receive in India the same recognition as is afforded to domestic judgments of the same character (9) While as in the case of other judgments they are no less binding because erroneous, foreign judgments in rem are generally

open to the same objections as those in personam, such as want of jurisdiction, natural justice, or fraud (1)

While the rules applicable to the class of cases where the defendant sets up a foreign judgment by way of defence are contained in sect 13, yet apart from the amendment of that section, introduced by sect 5 of Act VII of 1888, no statutory provision existed with reference to suits brought to enforce foreign judgments. That amendment, however, recognized the previously existing right to bring a suit on a foreign judgment, and in fact such judgments have been frequently enforced by suit in this country, being considered to impose a duty or obligation which the Courts are bound to give effect to (2). In respect of the latter class of suits, the general rules are that the judgment must be an adjudication upon the actual merits, (3) final and conclusive, (4) and may be impeached upon the ground that the Court was without jurisdiction to try the case, (5) or that the defendant had not been summoned, and had had no opportunity of making a defence, (6) or on the ground of fraud (7)

in the judgment (1) It may, in fact, be generally said that whatever objections are declared by the Legislature to be admissible against a foreign judgment produced by a defendant in bar to an action are equally admissible against a foreign judgment produced by a plaintiff either to found or support an action (2) There is, however, a distinction between a case in which a defendant puts forward a foreign judgment as a bar to a suit under sect 11, and a case in which a plaintiff seeks to enforce a foreign judgment In the former it may fairly be supposed that the parties submitted to the jurisdiction of the foreign Court (3) Jurisdiction being properly territorial and attaching, with certain restrictions, upon every person permanently or temporarily resident within the territory, does not follow a foreigner, after his withdrawal thence, living in another State As to land within the territory, jurisdiction always exists, and may exist, over moveables within it, and exists in questions of status, or succession, governed by domicile But no territorial legislation can give jurisdiction, which a Court of a foreign State ought to recognize, over an absent foreigner owing no allegiance to the State so legislating In a personal action, to which none of the above cases of jurisdiction apply, a decree pronounced by a Court of a foreign State in absentem the latter not having submitted himself to its authority, is by international law a nullity Not to the Courts of the State in which the cause of action has arisen, nor in cases of contract to those of the locus solutionis, should resort be had by the plaintiff, but to the Courts of the State in which the defendant resides, the Courts of the latter State having jurisdiction in all personal actions (4) Though, as a general rule, a Court can exercise jurisdiction over a foreigner only if he is resident within the limits of its territorial jurisdiction, and though natives of British India are foreigners, yet they owe allegiance to the common Sovereign of England and British India, and are subject to the supreme legislative authority in the British Empire If, therefore, the supreme Legislature in the British Empire authorizes an English Court in any class of cases to exercise jurisdiction over a non resident foreigner by reason of the cause of action arising within its jurisdiction, and the foreigner is a native of British India he cannot treat the judgment passed as a nullity, merely because he did not reside within the jurisdiction of the Court which passed it Order XI r 1 (e), under the English Judicature Act, constitutes a Legislative Act of the sovereign power regulating the jurisdiction in the case of a British subject resident in British India and outside the ordinary territorial jurisdiction of the English Courts, and gives the latter jurisdiction over such British subjects, assuming that the particular case falls within the order But it is open to a defendant to show that this is not so, and that the English Court had in fact no jurisdiction (1) It is not sufficient ground for impugning the judgment of a foreign Court, which ordinarily proceeds in accordance with the recognized principles of judicial investigation, to show that in the particular instance its procedure may have been irregular. It may be assumed that the procedure was regular, but if there was irregularity, it would not be sufficient ground for refusing respect to the judgment (2)

On the other hand, as has been already observed, the general rule is that a Court which entertains a suit on a foreign judgment cannot institute an inquiry into the merits of the original action or the propriety of the decision (3) This rule, however, was in the last Code abrogated with reference to the judgments of certain foreign Courts in Asia and Africa by the enactment in sect 5 of Act VII. of 1888, amending sect 13 of the Code, and which enactment was passed with reference to the arguments urged by the Bombay High Court (4) for distinguishing the judgments of the Courts of native States from those of other foreign Courts. So where a suit was brought in a Court in British India upon the basis of a decree of the Council of Regency of the State of Rampur, it was held that the Court was empowered by sect 14 (corresponding with sect 13) of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by Act VII. of 1888, to consider the merits of the case in which the decree of the Council of Regency had been passed (5) It was held in effect by the Madras High Court that this amendment did not alter the general rule already mentioned, except by vesting in the Court a judicial discretion to inquire into the merits of any case in which it appeared that no confidence was to be reposed in the judgment of a foreign Court, being one of those which are mentioned in the amended section. A party to an action on such a judgment had not a right to have the case reheard. All that the section said was that the Judge was not to be precluded from inquiry into the merits (6) The last paragraph of the corresponding section in the last Code has been now omitted, and no distinction now exists between the judgments of Asiatic and African Courts and other foreign Courts. Where a decree is obtained upon a foreign judgment it is to be executed according to the provisions of the Code (1). The judgment of a foreign Court obtained on a decree of a Court in British India is no bar to the execution of the original decree (2). Sect 112 provides for the execution of decrees of Courts established by the Government of India in Native States, and sect 113 allows of the execution in particular instances, upon the permission of the Governor in Council of the decrees of other Native Courts as if they had been made by the Courts in British India.

It is a well recognized principle that crimes, including in that term all breaches of public law punishable by pecuniary mulct or otherwise, at the instance of State Government, or of some one representing the public, are local in this sense, that they are only cognizable and punishable in the country where they were committed. Accordingly, no proceeding, even in the shape of a civil suit, which has for its object the enforcement by the State, whether directly or indirectly, of punishment imposed for such breaches by the lex fori, ought to be admitted in the Courts of any other country (3).

Interlocutory orders and orders in execution proceedings—Sect 11 is not exhaustive of the effects of the principle of res judicata (4). These orders, if not appealed from, are binding upon the parties in all subsequent proceedings in the same suit. Though sect 11 of the Code does not in terms apply to these orders, yet the principle which underlies it is equally applicable to them as to regular suits. The Privy Council, speaking of such an order, held that, "It was as binding between the parties and those claiming under them as an interlocutory judgment in a suit is binding upon the parties in every proceeding in that suit, or as a final judgment in a suit is binding upon them in carrying the judgment into execution. The binding force of such a judgment depends, not upon sect 13 of Act X of 1877, but upon general principles of law. If it were not binding there would be no end to litigation" (5). The principle of res judicata applies to prevent parties raising a second time in the same suit, or in the same execution proceedings, an issue which, in that suit or on the execution proceedings in that suit, had been previously determined (6). re binding upon the parties to the suit in all subsequent proceedings in that suit, on principles analogous to those of res judicata strictly so called. It is, therefore, necessary to constitute a bar that there should be a hearing and final decision. Where an application for execution is allowed to be withdrawn, the matters in dispute are not heard and decided. There is, therefore, no res judicata (1). Though a decree does not in terms give a certain relief, yet if it is construed in orders passed upon it as having given that relief, it is not competent to the Court on a subsequent application to treat those orders as erroneous and put another construction on the decree (2). Sect. 47 differs from sect. 11 in this respect, that the latter section bars not only the trial of a suit or issue, where the suit or issue had been previously heard and determined, but also the trial of an issue which should have been raised in a previous suit by either party. When an issue arising out of the execution of a decree has not been raised and determined under sect. 47, there is nothing in that section to prevent a defendant, in a separate suit subsequently brought, from raising that issue in that suit (3). For a case where a previous application for execution was refused and judgment debtor's objection as to limitation disallowed, and as to the effect of such an order in a subsequent application for execution, see below (4). A judgment debtor cannot question the right of a decree holder to apply for execution when execution has been on previous occasions applied for by the latter, and granted by the executing Court (5). In the under mentioned case, (6) it was held that though the analogy furnished by sect. 11 could not be altogether left out of sight in the application there dealt with, yet the Court ought to facilitate inquiries which are necessary for the purpose of carrying out decrees passed by it, and to accept with readiness any information which shows that the litigants have disregarded any part of the Court's decree. It would be wrong to dismiss an application made with the above purpose, simply because the applicant may have made the same endeavour without success in another proceeding.

A witness in a proceeding under sect. 115 of the Criminal Procedure Code had asked for his costs in the Magistrate's Court but had been refused and was referred to a civil suit. On his bringing such suit it was held that there was no adjudication, no issues, no contesting parties, and that therefore the principle of res judicata did not apply (7).

In a suit for probate, the caveators assailed the whole of the will on the ground of undue influence, but the probate Court granted probate disallowing the objection. PLACE OF SUING.

15 Every suit shall be instituted in the Court of the lowest grade competent to try it.
Court in which suits to be instituted.

"Shall be instituted"—There is no provision either in the various Civil Court Acts or in the Code prescribing a minimum jurisdiction as there is prescribing a maximum jurisdiction. A superior Court is by this section forbidden from trying a suit cognizable by an inferior Court, not on account of any inherent incompetency to try it, but on grounds of public convenience and economy. It has been thought that this section prescribed a minimum limit of jurisdiction, and that, for instance, a Subordinate Judge would have no jurisdiction to try a suit which, owing to its value, was triable by a Munsif. But it has been held that this section refers to procedure only, and regulates the practice of the Courts, but does not deprive any Court of jurisdiction which it may otherwise possess (2). The section is merely directory, and does not oust the jurisdiction of a Subordinate or District Judge, (3) and the institution of a suit cognizable by a lower Court in a Court of higher jurisdiction is merely an irregularity which does not affect the jurisdiction of the Court (4) or the merits of the case (5) and such as was covered by sect 578 of the former Code (6).

Court—The term “Court of the lowest grade” refers only to Courts to which the Civil Procedure Code is applicable (1). It has been therefore held in Madras that Small Cause Courts had concurrent jurisdiction with Courts of Village Munsifs to hear suits which are cognizable by the latter (2).

“Lowest grade”—Throughout the country there are Courts of different grades having jurisdiction in suits of different amounts in certain prescribed local areas. The pecuniary jurisdiction must be determined with reference to the various Acts constituting the Courts and the question of the valuation of particular suits, in order to ascertain within the jurisdiction of which Court they fall, by reference to the Court Fees and Valuation Act, and the cases decided thereunder, to which reference has been made in the notes to sect 9, ante, “Pecuniary Jurisdiction.” Sect 144 of the Bengal Tenancy Act was held to be controlled by sects 15 and 17 of the former Civil Procedure Code. A suit for rent is therefore to be instituted, subject to pecuniary limitations, in the Court of the lowest grade competent to try it (3). Where there were two plaintiffs, one of whom should have sued, if sole plaintiff, in the Subordinate Judge’s Court as the Court of lowest grade, and the other could, by reason of the provisions of Act XX of 1863, only sue in the District Court, it was held that as it was competent for the plaintiffs to join this section did not apply so as to prevent the first plaintiff from joining with the second in instituting the suit in the District Court (4).

“Competent to try”—Competency here means jurisdiction. The competency of a Court depends upon the nature or subject matter of a suit, and upon the local and pecuniary extent of the Court’s jurisdiction. As regards the first certain Courts are Courts of special jurisdiction inasmuch as some classes of cases involve disputes with which superior or specially experienced tribunals are particularly familiar, and which can more satisfactorily be disposed of by them such as Revenue, Admiralty, Probate Divorce Patent Insolvency Courts, and the like. Further, cases of importance affecting considerable interests or involving questions of intricacy are left to be determined by the higher grade or superior Courts (5). So suits for damages for the infringement of the exclusive privilege to an invention or of a copyright in a design under the Inventions and Designs Act (6) or, for damages for the infringement of the copyright in books (7) have been specially made cognizable only by District Courts. So suits under sect 92, post, can be instituted only in a High Court or District Court. Miscellaneous proceedings unconnected with suits are generally triable outside the Presidency towns by District Courts though sometimes Subordinate Courts are empowered to

“Pecuniary or other limitations”—See as to these, notes to sects 9 and 15, ante

Scope of section—This section deals with local or territorial jurisdiction, which in the case of real actions depends on the situation of the property in litigation, and sect 20 deals with personal actions which depend on the place of accrual of the cause of action, or the residence of the defendant. The general rule of local jurisdiction, of which this section is an embodiment, is that immoveable property is exclusively subject to the laws and jurisdiction of the Courts of the country in which it is situate. It follows from this that no other laws or Courts can affect it. As expressly stated in the Explanation, the Courts of this country have, subject to the proviso, no jurisdiction in respect of immoveable property situate outside British India (1). But all property which has a foreign origin is not always outside the jurisdiction of Courts of this country (2). Where however, a suit was brought in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Mirzapur for redemption of lands lying within that district but included in the same mortgage with other lands lying within the family domains of the Maharajah of Benares it was held that as the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit in respect of the immoveable property in Mirzapur, that jurisdiction could not be ousted because in the course of the trial of the suit it became necessary incidentally to decide, for the purposes of the suit, questions relating to mortgaged property held by the defendants outside the jurisdiction in order to determine whether the plaintiff had a right to recover the mortgaged property situated in Mirzapur (3).

This section does not apply to the original civil jurisdiction of the Presidency High Courts which are governed by clause 12 of the Letters Patent, which empowers them to try suits for land or other immoveable property if such land or property shall be situated either wholly or in case the leave (4) of the Court shall have been first obtained in part within the Suits deemed to be for immoveable property—In the case of the High Courts there has been considerable conflict of opinion as to the essentials of jurisdiction, for which provision has been made by the Charters, to avoid which in regard to the practice of the Mofussil Courts the section contains detailed provisions as to local jurisdiction. The High Courts have ordinarily no jurisdiction to try suits relating to immoveable property, where such property is wholly situate without the local limits of their original jurisdiction, (5) and it would appear to be doubtful whether the Equitable jurisdiction of the High Courts in India is of the same extent as that which has been claimed by the Court of Chancery, namely to take cognizance of any equity between persons residing within the jurisdiction respecting lands outside it (6) Moreover, the present tendency, even in the case of English Courts, is to abstain from interfering in personam where the matter concerns land outside their jurisdiction (7) It is generally agreed that a suit for partition of immoveable property is a suit for immoveable property (8) So also is any suit seeking delivery to the plaintiff of land or other immoveable property. The Bombay High Court formerly appeared to take a view which would restrict the words "suits for land or other immoveable property" to suits of the last mentioned character (9) The other High Courts have held that that expression includes suits other than those for the possession of land, in fact, every suit in which a decree is asked for operating directly on the land such as to enforce a security upon it for foreclosure or redemption. Thus the decisions were conflicting upon the point whether such Courts are empowered to entertain suits for foreclosure or sale or redemption of property beyond their local jurisdiction, (10) or for specific performance of contracts relating to land similarly situated (1) In recent cases the Bombay High Court has also taken the broader view (2) In the Madras High Court, it was held that a "suit for land" includes any suit in which a decree is asked for operating directly upon the land (3) and therefore includes any suit brought to enforce a security upon land, such as a suit for sale of land equitably mortgaged by deposit of title deeds. Moore, J., taking that the present section of the Code was simply an amplification of the old section of the Act of 1859, on which clause 12 of the Letters Patent was based, observed that he was prepared to go further, and to hold that the phrase "suit for land or other immoveable property," as used in the Letters Patent, includes all suits mentioned in clauses (a) to (f) of this section. If the property is situate outside the jurisdiction, the High Court cannot take cognizance of it, even if immoveable property within the jurisdiction is also claimed in it, as clause 12 does not qualify the expression "suits for land," &c., with the word only, and the words "all other cases" are not to be understood as including cases of suits for immoveable plus moveable property but those in which immoveable property is not involved (4) It is, however, generally admitted that every suit having any reference to immoveable property is not a suit for immoveable property (5) It has been held that a suit to recover title deeds of certain land outside the local limits, even though it may involve a question of title to that land, is not a suit to obtain possession of, or deal in ny way with, land and is therefore cognizable by the High Court, (1) but this has been disputed (2) So also where in a suit by a landlord for rent no relief is claimed in respect of the land, but it becomes necessary to determine what the nature of the tenancy was, that question does not make the suit one "for and" (3) The High Court has also taken cognizance of an application to file an award which provided for the dissolution of a partnership in lands outside the local limits, and also that the defendant's share in the property should stand charged with the payment of a certain fund to be due by him to the plaintiff, and that the defendant should execute a mortgage of his share to the plaintiff as security for such payment, and that the tea garden at Darjiling should be sold in Calcutta (4)

The general Equitable jurisdiction of the High Court on the original side which it has inherited from the supreme Court, which in its turn administered the Chancery Rules, must also be considered (vide post) So the Courts of Equity will exercise their powers in personam in the case of trustees and others resident within their jurisdiction, to oblige such persons to perform trusts, to carry out contracts, and to obey the rules of Equity even where the subject-matter of the trust or contract or equity may be land situate out of their jurisdiction (5) Again there is the Equitable jurisdiction by grant of an injunction or appointment of a receiver Thus a suit for damages to certain immoveable property by a nuisance caused on it and for an injunction to restrain the nuisance, has been held to be a suit not for immoveable property, but exclusively in personam (6) Similarly, a suit by some of the trustees of an endowment of certain lands against their co-trustees in possession, for a declaration of plaintiff's title to be shcebais jointly with the defendants for the settlement of a scheme or the performance of the worship, for the appointment of a receiver, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering with the property, and for an account, is not a suit for those lands (7)

(4) Kellie v. Fraser, 2 C 445 (1877) The grounds of the decision were that the suit did not involve any determination of title to land being in this respect distinguishable from Delhi and London Bank v. Wordie 1 C 249 (1876) In the case however, of such a suit, and also others outside Presidency towns the effect of clause (d) of the section will have now to be considered it regards its decrees as commands or directions addressed to the defendant personally rather than as decisions directly affecting the subject matter of dispute. Though the Court cannot, in the case of lands situate without the jurisdiction, give relief in rem, still it can enforce its judgment, which is in personam by process in personam, as by attachments of the person, lands, and goods of the defendant within the jurisdiction until the defendant complies with the order of the Court. Thus in accordance with the principle laid down in the leading case on the subject, Penn v Lord Baltimore,⁽¹⁾ the Court of Chancery has entertained actions for account and discovery of rents and profits, for specific performance and injunction, for foreclosure of mortgages, and for the execution of conveyances and the like regarding lands situate abroad, and whether within the King's Dominions or not, though if the very title itself to the lands is in question, the Court will not assume jurisdiction.⁽²⁾

The Courts have thus compelled the performance of contracts and trusts, which were not either locally or ratione domicilii within their jurisdiction.⁽³⁾ But in this country the power to make orders in personam, though the subject matter of the suit is without the jurisdiction, which jurisdiction exists both in the case of the High Courts and the Provincial Courts, must be considered with reference to the limitations on jurisdiction imposed in the case of the former by the Letters Patent, and in the case of the latter by the provisions of this section. In the case of the High Courts, regard must be had to the real object of the suit and to what are the rights and intentions of the respective parties, and those cases which are founded upon the principle laid down in Penn v Baltimore must be distinguished from those which depend not so much upon the jurisdiction generally exercised by Courts of Equity, as upon the question whether the suit is substantially one within the statutory jurisdiction conferred upon the Courts.⁽⁴⁾ So when a suit which, though in form one brought for an injunction or relief obtained through personal obedience, is in substance a suit "for land," which land is situate without the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court, the latter has no power to grant the relief prayed for.⁽⁵⁾ The Equitable jurisdiction of the High Courts is not as extensive as that which has been claimed by the Court of Chancery.⁽⁶⁾ Though the Courts here are governed by the same principles as those which are acted upon by Courts of Equity in England, this is only so far as such principles are not at variance with express legislative enactment.⁽⁷⁾

made in respect of the property in suit rather than the actual situation of the latter. If the suit is not by reason of its substantial character and the provisions of the Charters, within the cognizance of the Court, the latter is unable to grant relief. But where the relief sought is purely in personam and not in rem the Courts are empowered to make a decree which shall be of the same character (1).

The same rule applies in the case of Courts other than the Presidency High Courts, but in this case the provisions of this section must be considered. Under it, such Courts may exercise a jurisdiction in personam, but the jurisdiction seems to be of a more limited extent. Not only are they expressly deprived of power to entertain suits for foreclosure, sale or redemption, but the limitations imposed by clause (d) are in terms extensive, and the proviso determining their powers to act in personam limits the exercise of such powers to cases where the property is held by or on behalf of the defendant (2) resident within the jurisdiction (3) when the relief sought can be entirely obtained through his personal obedience, and where the property is situated in British India (4).

"Actually and voluntarily resides."—As to the meaning of these words, see the notes to sect. 20.

17. Where a suit is to obtain relief respecting, or compensation for wrong to, immoveable property situate within the jurisdiction of different Courts, the suit may be instituted in any Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction any portion of the property is situate.

Provided that, in respect of the value of the subject matter of the suit, the entire claim is cognizable by such Court.

Scope of section.—This section gives jurisdiction to a Court to entertain a suit in respect of properties partly situate within its territorial limits and partly out of it, where the same relief is sought in respect of the whole of the properties (5). The section corresponds to sects 11 and 12 of the Code of 1859, as also to sect. 19 of the last Code, with the exception that the grounds upon which jurisdiction is given on account of residence a guide will be found to the true interpretation of the term, and the grounds upon which such jurisdiction is given are the convenience not of the plaintiff but of the defendant and his witnesses, and the advantage which may accrue to the former by enforcing the judgment of the Court within its own jurisdiction (1) These connote a residence of a more or less permanent character

Nextly, even in the case of the same enactment and the same portion of it there can be no fixed rule for all cases Each case must depend upon its own particular circumstances (2)

It is necessary, in the first place, that the residence be actual and bona fide, and not merely colourable or collusive, for in such case there is no residence at all Assuming this, it cannot, however, be laid down with precision how long a person must stay in a place, and in what way, so as to be deemed to reside there A very short period of actual living has been held sufficient in some cases (3) Lastly may be considered those cases where a man has no permanent residence Great stress is laid in the cases on the fact as to whether or not the person said to reside within the jurisdiction had at the time any other residence elsewhere (4) When a man has no permanent residence he must be taken to dwell where he is actually staying (5) So in such cases a stay of a month was held sufficient in the case of a man who had no other residence, (6) the stay of a ship's captain in port, (7) and even ten days (8)

The other case is that in which a person has a permanent residence elsewhere A person may, however, dwell or reside at more places than one (9) But in order to afford foundation for jurisdiction the residences must be of a permanent character and be visited from time to time (10) When the defendant has a fixed and permanent residence elsewhere, to give jurisdiction on the ground of residence, something more than a temporary stay within the local limits of the Court is required (11) So a temporary residence of ten days, (12) a residence for the temporary purpose of attending a trial of a suit in which the party was a defendant, (13) staying in a place with a definite object or fixed purpose for a short and limited period, (1) will not, in the case of a man who has a bonâ fide and permanent abode elsewhere, give jurisdiction. So where an officer attached to a regiment at Vellore went on medical leave to Madras, where he resided in a rented house and finally returned to Vellore, the latter was held to be the place where he dwelt (2).

In conclusion, it may be said that while neither "dwell" nor "reside" necessarily implies a permanent state of things, (3) yet when it is desired to speak of residence for a limited time a limiting adjective is applied, and when there is no such qualifying adjective permanent residence is understood (4). The residence contemplated by the Letters Patent, (5) and (subject to Explanation I) the Code, must be of a more or less permanent character, of such a nature as to show that the Court in which a defendant is sued is his natural forum (6). The Court will not snatch a jurisdiction which was not intended to be conferred (7). As regards Explanation I, vide post Sect 265 of the Contract Act is permissive and does not prohibit a suit elsewhere than at the place where the partnership was carried on, if a sufficient ground of jurisdiction exists (8).

Explanation I—The term residence is here applied to the temporary residence of a defendant in respect of a cause of action arising at the place where he has such temporary residence. That is an enlarging explanation for a limited purpose, and not an interpretation or definition of the word as usually understood (9). The Explanation is identical with Explanation (a) to sect 8 of the Small Cause Courts Act, XI of 1865 (10). In respect of any cause of action arising at the place of permanent dwelling, he must be sued there (11). The change in the Explanation appears to be of a verbal character.

Explanation II.—This is in general conformity with the English decisions, though under the Indian rule the carrying on of business is not only a circumstance for determining the residence of a company, but an independent ground of jurisdiction also (1) The Secretary of State in Council is not a body corporate, though he may be used as such (2) Foreign corporations or companies have their domicile in the country where they are incorporated, and thus come into existence. But they may also be deemed to reside in the country in which they have their seat and principal place of business (3)

"Carries on business."—This phrase is of varying import, and must be interpreted according to the context and the apparent purpose of the Legislature (4) In the first place this expression here connotes more than being busy or doing business merely, and more than mere service, employment, or occupation. A man who busies himself about science or politics, though he may have a great deal of business to transact in respect of these matters, does not "carry on business", nor does a domestic servant, a clerk, or assistant in a trading or mercantile concern. The words mean the carrying on of business by the person whose business it is, and mean to describe a person managing or conducting his own, and not somebody else's, business. He must either manage or conduct a business of his own, or the business which is managed or conducted for him must be his own. The servant or employee is not carrying on his own business, but his master's. A person carries on business when he controls or directs it (5)

The term "business" is not limited to commercial business. So where a person was in daily attendance on his patients as surgeon, apothecary, and accoucheur within a certain district, he was held to be carrying on business there (6) It has, however, been held that zemindary business is not within the rule, (7) nor the receipts of presents or offerings (8) There is a conflict of opinion as to whether the Government can (9) or cannot (10) be said to carry on business

(1) See the English cases which will be found cited in Hukm Chand, C P C 315, 324, where it is also pointed out that the explanation settles a number of points upon which there is a conflict of opinion in the English Courts

(9) Bipradas Dey v Secretary of State, 14 C 262 n (1885), Subbaraya v Government, 1 M H C R 286 (1862) It is also pointed out in Hukm Chand, C P C p 321, that several suits have been decided in the High Courts and Presidency Small Cause Courts in which the cause of action did not accrue within the local limits of their jurisdiction, and those Courts could have jurisdiction only if the Government could be held to carry on business within those limits see Ro v Johnston v Secretary of State, 2 Hyde, 153 (1864), P & O S N Co v Secretary of State, 5 B H C R App 1 (1861), Brito v Secretary of State, 6 B 251 (1881), Hari Bhanji v Secretary of State, 4 M 344 (1879)

(10) Rundik v Secretary of State, 1 Hyde, 37 (1863), in which it was said that Government should be sued where the cause of

In the under mentioned case (1) the Court of first instance, whose judgment was reversed on appeal (2) held that the carrying on of business must involve pretty much the same element of permanency as is necessary to convert a mere "staying" into "dwelling." But it does not seem to be necessary that the business should be carried on permanently, and each case must be decided on its own facts (3). Thus a person who had no regular office, but went once or twice a week from the Mofussil to a friend's house in Calcutta, and saw people there on business, and contracted there with some man for the hire of cargo-boats, was held to carry on business or personally work for gain at Calcutta (4).

The business need not be one carried on personally (5). This is shown by the omission of the term "personally" before the words "carry on business," and its introduction before the words "work for gain." The defendant must, however, carry on some independent regular business in person, or at an office or other fixed place of business, either personally or by clerks or servants employed by the defendant and conducting the business under his control, and in his individual or partnership name (6). So in the last mentioned case it was held that the defendant had no place of business in Madras the sales being effected by another person X in his independent business or trade of a general broker for a commission received from the purchasers. In such case it was X and not the defendant who was carrying on business in Madras.

A person may carry on business at the same time at several places by means of different agents as is often really the case. The employment however, of a person as one's commission agent, or simply consigning goods to a commission (7) or general (8) agent for sale by him in the exercise of his own calling does not constitute carrying on business at the place where that person or agent may be residing or carrying on his own business or action arises. Doya Narain Tewary v Secretary of State, 14 C 256 (1886) [the words "carry on business or personally work for gain" are inapplicable to the Secretary of State].

doing or selling what he may have been employed to do or sell. In the under mentioned case (1) it was held that a defendant does not carry on business at a place, though he may have an agent there for certain purposes connected with his business, where that which is the essential ingredient in his business does not take place within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court. In delivering judgment, Sausse, C.J., said "To determine whether a defendant is carrying on business, it must first be ascertained what his particular trade, calling, or occupation is, and then we can examine whether the facts proved amount to a carrying on of that particular trade, calling or occupation within the jurisdiction. The present defendant is admittedly a retail vendor in European goods, and obtains his livelihood by the profit which he makes upon his sales, without 'sale' he could not make profit, or, in other words, he could not carry on business for the purpose of gaining a livelihood. 'Sale' is an essential ingredient in carrying on this defendant's business, and in the present case, to give this Court cognizance of suit upon that ground it must be shown that 'sale' by the defendant in the way of a retail dealer has taken place within our territorial limit. The place of sale, in the present case, is the true place of the defendant's carrying on business."

As to the question whether jurisdiction in regard to foreigners is limited to those who personally carry on business, vide ante, p. 171.

"Personally works for gain"—These words were inserted to give the Courts jurisdiction over persons who, though dwelling out of the local limits, personally worked for gain within them (2). So a person residing at Ghosery, outside Calcutta who habitually and constantly came to Calcutta for the purpose of making contracts as part of his business as a contractor, was held to carry on business and work for gain in Calcutta (3). An advocate of the High Court residing out of the local limits but who holds himself out as ready to practise in the High Court and who goes whenever he is engaged to appear personally works for gain within the local limits (4). In order that jurisdiction should attach on the ground of working for gain, such working should be habitual (5). Further, to constitute work there must be some mental or physical effort. To take advantage of an innate holiness as a reason for accepting presents or offerings as your natural due is not work, nor is the blessing which the defendant invokes upon the dwellings which he visits (6). As to whether Government can be said to personally work for gain, vide ante p. 180.

"Cause of action"—The meaning of this term has been the subject of considerable controversy which however, so far as this section is concerned is now settled, and it is not proposed to do more than to give the references to the somewhat numerous decisions in which the question was discussed prior to the amendment of the section in 1833. Sometimes these words have been given the restricted sense of immediate occasion of the action, which itself means the right to have recourse to the Courts, in other and perhaps the greater number of cases, the wider sense of necessary conditions of its maintenance. In the former sense it is the mere matter of fact, the failure of the defendant to do, or forbear from doing, to give or make good, that which the plaintiff's right entitles him to insist upon—in other words, the infraction of the right, as, in the case of a contract, its breach. In the latter sense it is this matter of fact plus the right incident in the plaintiff, or, to take the example chosen both the making of the contract and its breach (1). In this last sense, "cause of action" therefore means every fact which is material to be proved to entitle the plaintiff to succeed, (2) and everything which, if not proved, gives the defendant an immediate right to judgment, must be part of the cause of action, (3) though the term does not comprise every piece of evidence which is necessary to prove each fact, but every fact which is necessary to be proved (4). In this view of the case, the cause of action (which must exist at the date of the action (5)) is composed of several parts, which must, of course, necessarily include as one of such parts the infraction (6) of the right claimed.

The next question is, whether in order to give jurisdiction the whole cause of action should have arisen within the jurisdiction or whether it is sufficient that a part of such cause of action should have so arisen. As regards the Presidency High Courts, it is well settled that the term "cause of action," as used in clause 12 of the Charters (which, and not this section, governs such Courts), means the whole cause of action and not a material part of it (7).

though if a part of the cause of action shall have arisen within the jurisdiction a suit will lie in the High Court if leave have been previously obtained. For the purposes of the Letters Patent, the expression 'cause of action' means the bundle of facts which it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove before he can succeed in his suit. It does not include irrelevant or immaterial facts, but embraces material facts without which the plaintiff must fail. If any of these material facts have taken place within the jurisdiction of the Court then leave can be given under clause 12. But if no such material facts have taken place within the jurisdiction and leave is given there then it is open to the defendant to contend at the hearing that the Court has no jurisdiction (1).

Prior to the amendment of the corresponding section of the last Code in 1888 it was held that the words therein used did not mean the whole cause of action but any material portion of the nature stated in Explanation III to that section which was added in the year mentioned. And therefore the Courts governed by the Code were held to have jurisdiction if such a material portion of the cause of action arose within their jurisdiction (2). Sect 7 Act VII of 1888, gave effect to these decisions by adding the third Explanation to the former section which rendered further discussion in the case of suits arising out of contract unnecessary (vide post). The rule moreover, has been reaffirmed recently to be of general application in all suits (3). And now the section expressly gives jurisdiction where the cause of action wholly or in part arises. No leave is required in the latter case.

Under the Code British Courts are empowered to pass judgment against a non resident foreigner provided that the cause of action has arisen within the jurisdiction of the Court pronouncing the judgment (4). The Court in whose local jurisdiction the funds of an endowment received from a foreign territory are expended by the parties residing there, has full power to determine questions as to the management of the funds quite apart from the title to the grant, which may not be in dispute (1) As to residence, etc., giving jurisdiction in case of foreigners, see post, and as to cases in which the cause of action arises below low water mark and within three miles of it the case under-mentioned (2)

Whatever the cause of action may be the jurisdiction created at the place of its accrual is not affected by the death of the person originally liable, and it is a general principle that the representative of a deceased person may be sued in that Court within the jurisdiction of which the cause of action with the deceased person arose (3) The accrual of a cause of action within the local limits of a Court's jurisdiction will not give the Court jurisdiction over a suit in which any other cause of action arising out of those limits is joined, it being, in fact, a pre-requisite of the right to join in one suit more than one cause of action against a defendant that the Court to which the plaint is presented should have jurisdiction over all the causes of action (4)

The term "cause of action" is used in the Code applies to torts as well as contracts (5) Reading clauses (a), (b), and (c) with the words "every suit" it appears that all suits of whatever nature subject to the limitations in the preceding sections, are referred to Sect 19 contains special provisions with regard to suits for compensation for wrong done but suits on tort not within the words of that section will fall under this In India the cause of action has been always held to furnish the forum not only of suits in contracts but in its broader sense to apply also to suits on torts

As already stated the words "cause of action" in this section do not mean necessarily the whole cause of action but a suit to which the section applies may be instituted where some portion of the cause of action arises (6) So in a suit praying that a fraudulent compromise and decree founded thereon might be declared void and for an injunction restraining execution it was held that though the decree was made and compromise entered into in Calcutta (where in respect of them the cause of action arose) yet a material part of the cause of action, namely the infringement of the plaintiff's right by executing the decree having taken place in Cawnpore the suit lay in that district (7)

Though a special provision as to jurisdiction over suits on torts has been made in sect 19, there is nothing in the general words of the present one to exclude them from its operation The Courts will therefore have jurisdiction

when the cause of action arises within their jurisdiction or the defendants reside, etc., there. And it is not necessary that both the constituents of jurisdiction should exist in British India (1). The provisions of this section are independent of the general principles of international law, but there is nothing even in these principles to restrict the jurisdiction of the Courts of any country to cases in which the cause of action should have arisen in that country. In England it is settled that an action will lie there against a defendant there upon a transaction in a place in another country (2). Explanation III to the former section had no reference to torts. But the term "cause of action" was, under the last Code, independently of that explanation, construed to mean not the whole cause of action—if such cause of action involves more than the mere commission of the delict—in suits to which the Code applies (3). Probably, the cause of action will usually be construed in a restricted sense, so as not to involve the right violated, but to denote only the violation or the breach of a duty which entitles the plaintiff to relief (4). In any case, a large number of cases in tort will come within the special provisions of the preceding section. In a recent English case dealing with the effect of a judgment in the Calcutta High Court in divorce proceedings condemning in damages a defendant, a British subject, who though formerly resident in India, had left this country before the petition was issued, and was now domiciled in England, it was argued on his behalf that the Calcutta High Court had no jurisdiction over him, but it was held that the power to give damages was ancillary to the judgment on status concerning the marriage, which judgment, being in rem, would bind the world (5).

A Court may entertain a suit to set aside a decree on the ground of fraud provided that the requirements of this section or of the Charter, as the case may be, are satisfied (6). In the case of a libel, the suit will lie where it has been published (7). In a suit to set aside a release executed in Calcutta of the plaintiff's interest in certain property in Bombay it was held that the cause of action included the effect of the release on the property in Bombay, and did not wholly arise in Calcutta (8). This section, in the case of suits between landlord and tenant, is controlled by sect 141 of the Bengal Tenancy Act (1) In cases instituted under Act IX of 1861, the Court is to be guided by the Code, and where there is an objection to jurisdiction this section will be considered (2) As regards Probate jurisdiction, see Act V of 1881 (3)

Explanation III. of former section—This has been omitted, as its relation was considered unnecessary owing to the addition made to sub clause (c) of the words "wholly or in part" in reference to the cause of action Though omitted, the Explanation gave a correct statement of what is still the law (4) and is therefore here dealt with This Explanation settled the signification of the term "cause of action" in the case of suits arising out of contract Its language was wide enough to include all cases of contract, though not obligations in the nature of quasi contracts, (5) though it is said (6) that the corresponding rule of locus solutionis in other countries does not apply to contracts already executed or creating personal status Certain relations, such as those of marriage and adoption, though originally based on contract, are not themselves sources of rights and duties on account of the grounds of contract (7) While a suit may be arising out of contract within the meaning of the Explanation, it does not follow that all the clauses of that section will be applicable to it, as in the case of a suit arising out of contract claiming a sum payable not in performance of the contract, but as damages for its breach (8) It may be a question whether the language of the Explanation is explicit enough to include suits for the cancellation of contract, the forum contractus in Roman law being generally held to apply to actions arising out of the natural development of the obligation, and, therefore, leading to its fulfilment A suit for the cancellation of a contract must, however, always be for some cause, and the nature of the cause and the place of its accrual, and not necessarily the place of the contract, will furnish the forum for such suits (9) But whether it does or not the suit will be within the section

In suits arising out of contract the cause of action is deemed to arise, according to the omitted Explanation, at three places —

(a) The place where the contract was made The determination of this question belongs to the law of contracts This will be the place of meeting where there is a personal meeting of the parties—except perhaps, where the validity of a contract is made to depend upon the observance of a particular form, in which case the place at which that form is completed is the true place of the contract, because until such completion no party is bound (10)

"Of any of the parties"—1 person who has received a notice of an application made by a judgment-debtor to be declared an insolvent, and whose name is on the record as an opposing creditor, is a party on whose application a transfer may be made under this section (1) The section permits transfer upon the application of parties as well as of the Court's own motion without such application (2)

"Notice"—The present section, unlike the two previous sections requires notice to be given by the Court and not by the party Where the order was made without notice having been given to the plaintiffs it was set aside (3) The provision as to notice is one of procedure and practice, and the requirements as to notice may be waived (4)

"At any stage"—These words have been added to the first paragraph to remove the difficulty created by the view that a suit cannot be transferred after the hearing has once commenced, as to which there was a conflict of decision See note, post, "Pending"

Power of High Court to transfer—Besides the powers conferred by this section, the High Court, under clause 13 of the Letters Patent has power to transfer to itself only when it thinks proper to do so either on the agreement of the parties to that effect or for purposes of justice the reasons for doing so being recorded in the proceedings of the High Court No statement of the grounds on which the Court will act can be exhaustive Transfers have been granted on the following grounds That the parties and witnesses reside in Calcutta, that it would be cheaper to try the suit there, that all parties desired a transfer, (5) that $\frac{1}{3}$ of the property claimed was in Calcutta, and that it was undesirable that an amin of a Mofussil Court should partition such property, that the suit might be tried more cheaply and expeditiously in Calcutta, (6) that difficult questions of law were involved and the conduct of the Judge towards the plaintiff made it impossible that he should be able to deal with the suit with impartiality or freedom from prejudice (7) that the questions involved were of importance or difficulty, the balance of convenience or cheapness of trial, the residence of parties really interested and witnesses either in Calcutta or its immediate neighbourhood the advance of money and presence of books in Calcutta, the defendant's want of means to go herself or take her writes as to a Mofussil Court the refusal to transfer placing difficulties in the way of the defence, and that the prayers for injunction and receiver rendered the case eminently one to be tried in the High Court (1). It has also been held that the mere fact that it would be less expensive to try the case in the High Court was not sufficient of itself for the Court to act upon and order the case to be transferred, and that to justify transfer it must be shown that the trial in the Court in which the suit had been instituted would be unsatisfactory (2).

The application should be made to a Judge sitting on the original side of the Court (3). The substantive law applicable to the case will be the law of the Court from which it has been transferred (1). The words 'to remove and try and determine' in the Letters Patent have a wide signification. They are not limited to any particular period or stage of the suit, considered as a regular series of steps in procedure. After the commencement of a suit between parties, as long as the proceedings in the Court of first instance are in such a condition that the party is entitled to ask that Court to raise and judicially determine any question material to the final result of the suit as between himself and the other party, so long is the suit in existence in the first Court and capable of being removed under clause 13 in order that such questions may be determined in the High Court (5).

District Court—In the Punjab Central Provinces and Burmah, the Courts of the Divisional Judge and Commissioner are by the Courts Acts of those provinces given the powers conferred on the District Court by this section, which has not been drafted with reference to the system of judicial administration prevailing in the provinces mentioned (6). An order of transfer made by a District Court under this section, transferring a suit in which an appeal would lie from a decree made therein, was held not subject to revision (7). And the principle was considered to apply where a District Judge had transferred a suit from a Subordinate Court to his own file, and before his hearing it an application was made to the High Court for its transfer to some other Court (8). The High Court refused in its extraordinary jurisdiction to interfere, except under circumstances of a very special nature, with the discretion of a Judge who had transferred, under the provisions of the last Code execution proceedings under a decree from one Subordinate Court to another (9). It was held, under the Code of 1859 that where a District Court had jurisdiction to try a suit and the defendant made no application to the Judge or communication to the plaintiff with a view to its being tried in a different district the case was not one for the exercise of any special power by the High Court for that purpose (1)

"Transfer or withdraw"—This section, which corresponds with sect 25 of the last Code, is clearly worded to show that it applies both to the transfer and withdrawal of suits, covering also transfers to a Court newly established. There is no restriction as to the grounds on which a transfer or withdrawal may be ordered under this section, which applies to the High Court, whose powers under the Letters Patent have already been considered. A usual ground is personal disqualification on account of pecuniary or other personal interest of the presiding Judge (2). A transfer has been ordered on the ground that serious questions of law were likely to arise in connection with winding up proceedings, which it would be difficult to discuss in the absence of the necessary authorities, and that the proceedings were such that they would ultimately go before the High Court in a variety of appeals from orders, (3) also of execution proceedings "in order to do equity between the judgment creditors according to the spirit of the Civil Procedure Code", (4) also on the ground that the transfer would tend to the convenience of both parties, and more especially to the applicant (5). The fact however, that the Judge of the Court was not sufficiently acquainted with the character in which the disputed signatures were written was held not to be sufficient ground, as in such a case it would be open to the parties to call experts (6).

The section does not make it obligatory in a Court to record the reasons for its order, and though it is desirable that the reasons should be recorded yet a failure to do so will not vitiate the order or the subsequent proceedings (7). Nor is the transfer invalid if the order has been made under a misconception of facts (8). As to the presumption where there is no order on the face of the proceedings, see note, (9) as to jurisdiction to transfer, see note "Pending post".

"Suit, appeal, or other proceeding"—The term "suit" in the earlier Code should it was held be construed in its broadest sense (10). The section itself shows that it is applicable to appeals, a power which was not given to the High Courts by the Letters Patent (11) or appeals. section, taken with sect 617 (corresponding with sect 141) was held to authorize the transfer of a claim under sect 331, (1) and of winding up proceedings under the Indian Companies Act, 1882, by the High Court from a District Court to itself, the Act providing for their transfer from one District Court to another (2) There was a conflict of opinion whether the word "suit" in the section which this replaces included execution proceedings or not The Allahabad (3) and Bombay (4) High Courts held that it did It is to be observed that sect 223 of the former Code related to transfer of applications for execution The Madras High Court appears to have been of opinion that the word "suit" in this section in the last Code was used in its restricted sense of proceedings before decree, but that even assuming that it included execution proceedings, the limitation as to jurisdiction contained in the section, which authorized the transfer to a Subordinate Court competent to try the suit, could only be imported into sect 223 of the Code of 1882, so far as it was consistent with that section (5) The Calcutta High Court held both under the corresponding provisions in the Code of 1859, (6) as also under the Code of 1882, (7) that there was no power under this section of that Code to transfer execution proceedings The present section extends the Courts' power over miscellaneous proceedings other than suits or appeals

"Pending"—The word used in the corresponding section of the Code of 1859 was "instituted" It was accordingly held that the transfer could take place only on the institution of the suit, and that it was not intended that a case in progress of trial might be transferred (8) The substitution of the word

(7) Kishori Mohun Satt v Gul Mahomed Shaha, 15 C 177 (1887), in which, however adherence was given to previous decisions chiefly as a rule of practice and in which no reference was made to the substitution of the word 'pending' for "instituted"

(8) Ram Nath v Gowhur, 2 N W P H C R 230 (1870), Yakoob Ali v Luchmun Das 6 N W P 80 (1874) Asmedh Koonwar v Taylor, 1864, W R 14, Dumree Sahoo v Jugdharee, 13 W R 398 (1870) Soorendro Pershad Dobe v Nundun Misser 21 W R 196 (1874) but see Tarucknath Mookerjee v Gourree Churn Mookerjee, 3 W R 147 (1865), in which it was held that when a Judge transfers a case to his own file, he is at liberty to amend the issues first laid down, and to frame additional issues and to go into the whole case except upon any question upon which there has been a judicial finding And as to remand, see this case and Mahomed Zahoor v Thakooranee Rutta, 2 N W P 431 (1870)

"pending" bars any such construction in future, a construction which is further prohibited by the insertion of the words "at any stage" So it has been held, that the High Court had jurisdiction under this section to make a transfer to a Subordinate Judge, though the case was in part heard (1) Even now, however, the section will not authorize a transfer affecting any special exclusive jurisdiction conferred by law (2) So as the Court which pronounced the judgment is the only Court which can review it, proceedings on an application for a review of a Court's decision cannot be transferred to another Court (3) Nor may a District Court exercise its powers to transfer so as to oust any Court of a jurisdiction over any particular suit which may have been referred to it by order of a High Court or other Supreme Court (4) Thus, it has been held that the terms of the section are inapplicable to a suit which the Subordinate Court had received by an order of remand from a Court to which the District Court was itself subordinate (5)

The word "pending" denotes, it is said, duly pending The suit, therefore, to be transferred must, it has been held, be pending in a Court of competent jurisdiction, and an order made under this section will have no effect if the Court in which the suit is pending has no jurisdiction over it (6)

"Subordinate"—A transfer may be made only from or to a Court to which the Code applies In the under mentioned case, (7) Hutchins, J, considered that the District Judge would have the power of transferring a case pending before one village munsif to another, not under this section, which he considered questionable, but under general principles, as some one must have the power, and it would be best vested in the munsif's official superior, the District Judge The subordination contemplated is apparently not that for the purposes of appeal as in sect 23, clause (1), ante, but of an administrative character (1) It has formerly held that once a Court withdrew a suit and transferred it to its own files for trial, it exhausted all its powers under this section, and it is not competent to retransfer it again to a Subordinate Court (2) The section however [see (1) (b) (iii)], now authorizes a Court after withdrawing a case to retransfer it for trial or disposal The Subordinate Court must be competent to try the suit—that is, must have jurisdiction (3) A District Judge can transfer a probate case for trial to a Subordinate Judge under clause (d), sub sect (2), sect 23, Act XII of 1887 (4) Where in a recent case a suit was filed as a Small Cause Court suit in the Court of a Subordinate Judge who had both Small Cause and regular jurisdiction, and he transferred it to the file tried by him as ordinary Judge, and passed a decree deciding a question of title to immoveable property, it was held that there was no substantial irregularity and that the decree was not final, but appealable, since it could not have been passed by a Small Cause Court (5) As to the power of District Judges under the Bombay Civil Courts Act, to refer to Assistant Judges applications under special Acts for disposal see note (6)

“Try or dispose of”—The word “trial” includes every recognized method of procedure laid down in the Code, and it is not necessary for the transfer that the Court transferring should not contemplate a reference of the case to arbitration (7) The present section adds the words “dispose of” which will often be applicable in the case of the miscellaneous proceedings to which the section is extended

“Court of Small Causes”—The expression “a Court of Small Causes” in the last clause of this section means a Court properly and strictly so called, and does not include a Court invested with the jurisdiction of a Court of Small Causes (8) The High Court, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, has the power to transfer a suit from the Calcutta Court of Small Causes to any other Court having equal or superior jurisdiction (9) The Court to which a suit is transferred will not become a Small Cause Court but only the suit transferred will be tried as a Small Cause Court suit (1) In the case under mentioned, (2) a Small Cause Court suit was instituted before a Judge invested with jurisdiction to try it. He retired from office, and the District Judge directed his successor, who had no Small Cause Court jurisdiction, to try it, it was held that the order must be considered as passed under this section, and no appeal lay from the decision to the District Court.

25 (1) Where any party to a suit, appeal or other proceeding pending in a High Court presided over by a single Judge objects to its being heard by him and the Judge is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for the objection, he shall make a report to the Governor General in Council, who may, by notification in the Gazette of India, transfer such suit, appeal or proceeding to any other High Court.

Power of Governor General in Council to transfer suits

(2) The law applicable to any suit, appeal or proceeding so transferred shall be the law which the Court in which the suit, appeal or proceeding was originally instituted ought to have applied to such case.

INSTITUTION OF SUITS.

26 Every suit shall be instituted by the presentation of a plaint or in such other manner as may be prescribed.

Institution of suits

"Plaint"—A plaint means a private memorial tendered to a Court in which the person sets forth his cause of action, the exhibition of an action in writing (3). It answers to the "statement of claim" in England. In India a plaintiff may present a written statement also. O VII rr 1-6 prescribe the contents of the plaint, which is the document with which every suit is instituted in this country, its object being to invoke the Court's assistance for the declaration, preservation, or enforcement of the plaintiff's right. A suit, according to this section, must commence with a plaint, and a proceeding which is capable of terminating in a decree or an order having the force of a decree cannot, on that ground alone, be deemed to be a suit within the meaning of the Code, if it has not commenced with a plaint. Such a proceeding is, in strictness, only a proceeding in a suit (4).

Presentation (a) Time—The only question which arises as to this, is whether a plaint may be presented on a Sunday or holiday, or out of Court hours. It has been enjoined that, without the consent of parties and in the absence of urgent necessity no civil trial should proceed on Sundays or gazetted holidays (1). In India however, Sunday is not a dies non, (2) and the holding of a judicial proceeding on a close holiday, though it may be an irregularity which if regularly shown would entitle a party to have the proceedings set aside as such an irregularity as can be waived (3). It has been expressly provided in the Bengal, N.W.P. and Assam Civil Courts Act, and the same will probably be held on general principles, to be the case that a judicial act done on a close holiday is not invalid by reason only of its having been done on that day (4). A plaint may be received and admitted on a Sunday (5) or other holiday (6). There is however no necessity to do so, for under the Limitation Act if the period expires when the Courts are closed the suit may be admitted on the day that the Court re-opens and so may any application (7).

(b) To whom—The former section required that the plaint should be presented to the Court or such officer who was specially appointed in that behalf. This will be so now though the words have been omitted. Ordinarily, the plaint is presented to the Court. A delivery to the clerk of a Small Cause Court has been held sufficient, (8) but not to a nazir (9) or moonserim (10). A plaint under Act X of 1859 presented to an Assistant Collector and not to the Collector, was held not to be properly filed (11).

(c) Place—Ordinarily the plaint is presented in open Court. The placing of a petition of appeal on a table when the officer is not present is not a presentation to him (12). The Allahabad High Court held that the presentation of a plaint at the private residence of the Munsif was not a sufficient institution (13). But in Bengal a plaint delivered at the private residence of a clerk of a Small Cause Court has been held to have been properly filed (14). Where a plaint sent by post was accepted the institution was considered sufficient by the Madras High Court (1) Where a plaintiff presented a plaint to the District Court, the Subordinate Judge's Court in which he ought to have presented it being then temporarily closed, it was held that the District Court could not be considered a Court of first instance competent to receive the plaint (2)

Date—The Code does not provide that the plaint should be dated, but it is generally provided by rules framed by the High Courts that the actual date of presentation should be endorsed on the plaint by the officer receiving it Where a plaint was presented on the 29th and the endorsement stated that it was accepted on the 31st, the former and not the latter date was held to be the date of institution (3) Where two suits are filed on the same day it must be presumed, until the contrary is proved that they were presented and admitted in the order in which the numbers appear in the Register of Civil Suits (4) The Code does not ordain or imply that, in the absence of a sufficient stamp, there can be no presentation, nor does the Limitation Act There is no warrant for inferring that a plaint means a plaint duly stamped So where a plaint was presented on the 14th September with an insufficient stamp, but the deficient stamp duty was paid on the 18th September, it was held that the suit was instituted on the 14th September (5) The date of institution should be reckoned from the date of presentation, and not from that on which the requisite court fees are subsequently put in so as to make it admissible as a plaint (6)

Registration—Sect 17 of the Registration Act (III of 1877) does not apply to proper judicial proceedings, whether consisting of pleadings filed by the parties or orders made by the Court (7)

INTEREST

34. (1) Where and in so far as a decree is for the payment of money, the Court may, in the decree, order interest at such rate as the Court deems reasonable to be paid on the principal sum adjudged, from the date of the suit to the date of the decree, in addition to any interest adjudged on such principal sum for any period prior to the institution of the suit, with further interest at such rate as the Court deems reasonable on the aggregate sum so adjudged, from the date of the decree to the date of payment, or to such earlier date as the Court thinks fit
Interest.

(2) Where such a decree is silent respect to the payment of further interest as aforesaid from the date of the decree as aggregate date other earlier date the Court shall order interest, and to suit.

Interest of 1841 and the Code which took effect in 1859 It only repl date of suit is a question of substantive law (1). Ordinarily an interest subject to the exceptions recognized by that law, the rate agreed upon must be awarded up to the date of suit (2). Interest after date of suit is, according to the opinion of the Calcutta (3) though not of the Madras High Court (4) in the discretion of the Court notwithstanding that a fixed rate of interest is mentioned as payable "up to realization". No additional Court fee is required on account of the claim for interest from the date of institution of suit till payment (5). There is no analogy between interest awarded under this section and mesne profits under O XX r 12 p (6).

Section 56 of the Transfer of Property Act (now O XXXIV r 2) excludes the discretion given by this section and binds the Court to decree the rate of interest provided by the mortgage, if not illegal, down to the date fixed by the Court according to the terms of the second paragraph of the section (7). After this period interest will run at the Court rate up to date of payment according to the practice and rules of the Calcutta High Court (8). This section relates to a decree for money and a mortgage decree until it reaches the stage shown by section 60 of the Transfer of Property Act cannot be so termed (9).

The Court has also a discretion to award interest after decree. The contract becomes merged in the decree, and the plaintiff recovers only such interest as, according to the course and practice of the Court, is allowed on debts for which the creditor has the security of its decree (1). Interest if not given in the decree is taken to have been refused, (2) but a party may by his conduct be estopped from objecting that execution cannot issue for a higher rate than that provided in the decree (3). If a decree holder gives up a portion of his claim and verbally agrees to receive the remainder by instalments, he does not thereby give up interest to which he is entitled under the decree (4). The rule of damdapat exists only so long as the contractual relation of debtor and creditor exists, but not when that relation has come to an end by reason of a decree (5). Thus where a decree has been passed on a mortgage the rule does not apply to the interest accruing after the date fixed for redemption (6). The rule of damdapat is not applicable if it was not applicable at the time when the decree became final and binding (7). The discretionary powers conferred by this section may be exercised without reference to the law of damdapat (8).

"In the decree"—A Court is not empowered by this section merely to embody in a decree interest which has been adjudged payable in the suit, for it is said that such a reading of the section would make it surplusage, as it does not require a rule of procedure to enable a Court to decree a relief which it has adjudged in its judgment (9). It has therefore been held that the Court may in the decree order payment of interest from the date of the suit onwards, although the judgment awards interest for the period prior to the institution of the suit only (10). But where a Judge in adjudging a specific sum, principal and interest, in terms dismissed "the rest of the claim," it was held that as the claim for interest after the institution of the suit was part of "the rest of the claim" and with it stood dismissed, the Court could not give interest by way of amendment of its decree (11). Where a district Judge gave no interest from the date of the suit and there was nothing to show that this was an over

COSTS.

35 (1) Subject to such conditions and limitations as may be prescribed, and to the provisions of any law for the time being in force, the costs of and incident to all suits shall be in the discretion of the Court, and the Court shall have full power to determine by whom or out of what property and to what extent such costs are to be paid, and to give all necessary directions for the purposes aforesaid. The fact that the Court has no jurisdiction to try the suit shall be no bar to the exercise of such powers

Costs

(2) Where the Court directs that any costs shall not follow the event, the Court shall state its reasons in writing

(3) The Court may give interest on costs at any rate not exceeding six per cent per annum, and such interest shall be added to the costs and shall be recoverable as such

Costs generally—The present section replaces sects 218–222 of the last Code. The first clause is with some additions taken from s 5 of the Judicature Act of 1890, and in effect embodies the provisions of sects 218–220 of the last Code. As regards the subject of execution see sect 36 of this Code. Sect 221 has been transferred to O XX r 6 where it appears as the third clause of that rule. Sect 222 is incorporated in the third clause of this section, the direction as to the payment of costs being paid out of or charged upon the subject matter of the suit being omitted. The power to order this is contained in the first clause of this section. As regards this, it has been held that a mortgagee having had the benefit of a partition and having accepted and approved of it as part of his title was though not a party to the partition suit bound by the equities attaching to the mortgaged property as incidents of the partition and was therefore liable in respect of a proportionate share of the charge for costs created by the order of the Court made in that suit under this section and such proportionate share of these costs should be deducted in priority out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property (2). Under the circumstances stated the cases decided under the former sections are here given

Disposal of costs—Sect 218 of the last Code enacted that When disposing of any application under this Code the Court may give to either party the costs of such application or may reserve the consideration of such costs for any future stage of the proceedings" When costs of an interlocutory proceeding have been disposed of, the award of general costs of the suit does not interfere with that interlocutory order (1) A Court finally determining a suit is bound to decide by which of the parties before it the costs shall be borne, it is not at liberty to declare that the costs shall be borne by the unsuccessful party in a suit to be hereafter brought (2) A decree drawn strictly in accordance with the provisions of sect 88, of the Transfer of Property Act, directs the costs to be recovered out of the mortgaged property (3) An omission to award costs cannot be considered a mere clerical error, but must be rectified by way of review within the prescribed time (4)

Parties paying or receiving costs—The person who receives the costs must, of course, be a party to the suit As regards the person who may be ordered to pay, the general rule in English Courts has been said to be, (5) that Courts have no power except over parties to the record, though an exception has been made where the party before the Court is a mere puppet in the hands of a stranger to the suit The Courts here have, in some cases, ordered persons not party to the record to pay costs (6) But under the last Code only parties could be made liable This appeared from the words, "any other party to the suit" in sect 102 of that Code (7) Where, however, there has been a contempt of Court, as where strangers were the real though hidden plaintiffs, and had executed a false lease in favour of the nominal plaintiff, who had brought the suit on the strength of such false lease, it was held that though the Code gave no power, yet that the High Court, inheriting the powers of the Supreme Court, could order such strangers to pay the costs of the suit (8) Persons interested, on behalf of whom a suit is brought under O I r 3 (formerly sect 30) but not joining or joined as parties, should not be made to pay costs (9) Where

Power of Court as to costs—Sect 220 of the last Code provided as follows “(1) The Court shall have full power to give and apportion costs of every application and suit in any manner it thinks fit, and the fact that the Court has no jurisdiction to try the case is no bar to the exercise of such power. Provided that if the Court directs that the costs of any application or suit shall not follow the event, the Court shall state its reason in writing (2) Every order relating to costs made under this Code and not forming part of a decree may be executed as if it were a decree for money”

The discretion to award costs was subject to other provisions and was thus limited in the case of certain suits instituted in the High Court, but cognizable by the Presidency Small Cause Courts (7) Where A demanded a particular sum as due to him from B, and the latter tendered a less amount, saying that that was all he owed, it was held in an action brought in the High Court that A was entitled to full costs, not being under any obligation to accept the lesser sum and sue for the balance in the Small Cause Court (8) For sections of the Code affecting the discretion, see O XI r 3 and O XXI r 72 The power, however, given, though a full power, was subject to the control of the Court of Appeal (9) The discretion as to the award of costs which a Court has is not taken away by the fact that a party to a suit is protected under the provisions of the Judicial Officers Protection Act (10)

As regards apportionment, the general rule is that if a plaintiff recovers a less amount than he claimed in his plaint, his costs should be apportioned

according to the amount recovered and not to the sum claimed (1). Costs thus follow the result of the case unless there are reasons to the contrary, so that where the plaintiff has failed in part and succeeded in part the costs are apportioned so as to give each party the costs applicable to the matter upon which he has succeeded (2). It is, however, not correct to say that costs must be invariably awarded in proportion to the amount decreed and dismissed. The Court has a discretion, and if a plaintiff has an honest claim in which he mainly succeeds he may be allowed full costs (3). As to costs of particular issues, see post, "Follow the event." The Court is given a wide discretion, but that discretion must be exercised on legal principles. It is a power to be exercised according to law and not according to mere caprice (4). The law as to the award of costs has been laid down by Jessel M.R. in Cooper v. Whittingham (5) in a passage which has been cited and adopted by the Madras High Court (6). An Appellate Court will not interfere with an exercise of discretion by the lower Court unless it has proceeded upon a manifestly wrong ground (7). See post.

"Follow the event."—This means the result of the decision (8). The second paragraph of the section indicates that costs must follow the event, unless there be good cause to the contrary. If a plaintiff succeeds he is ordinarily entitled to his costs (9). If a defendant succeeds he is ordinarily entitled to his costs (10). A plaintiff thus cannot get costs against a person against whom he has no cause of action (11). And a successful defendant cannot be made to pay the costs of the plaintiff (12). If a party substantially succeeds and proves his case against the defendant he is entitled to his costs, although he has not got the precise form of relief which he wanted (13). The mistakes of the opposite party are no reason for departing from the general rule of law that a successful party is entitled to his costs (1) The word "event" may, however, be read distributively, and where there are distinct causes of action the general costs of the cause follow the judgment, but the costs of the particular issues should be taxed in favour of the party who has succeeded on them (2) And the same rule is commonly applied in all cases where several issues are raised, and the party fails as to some and is successful as to others

The same general principles apply in the case of appeals (3) though the cost of an appeal may be severable from the general costs of the suit (4) It is a general, but not a universal rule, that the discretion of the Court below as to costs is not altered when there is no substantial alteration made in the decree itself (5) The respondent will not be deprived of costs on the dismissal of the appeal on the ground that the appellant had no previous notice of the preliminary objection which has prevailed (6) In his appeal from the Judge's order passed in favour of the plaintiff, and disallowing his own claim for costs, a defendant unnecessarily made a co defendant a respondent As this respondent could not be injured in any way in the appeal, it was held by Sir Baines Peacock (Mitter, J, dissenting) that although the appeal was dismissed, the co defendant was not entitled to costs simply because he had been present watching the case (7) When an Appellate Court decrees an appeal and gives costs of its own Court, the costs of the first Court should be included in the decree (8) A decree for "usual costs and interest" means all costs which the successful party has incurred from the commencement of the suit until the date of the final decree with interest at (now) 6 per cent from the date of the decree (9) A direction in a decree that "the respondent should pay to the appellants the costs incurred by them in the Lower Court" means the costs specified in the decree appealed against as the costs incurred by the appellants (10) Where a decree under which costs have been recovered is set aside in appeal an express order is not needed for a refund of the costs with interest (11)

the successful appellant is, as a rule, entitled to his costs (1) But where an appeal was affirmed upon wholly different grounds from those relied upon by the Court below, the dismissal was ordered to be without costs (2) And where a partial alteration was made by the Appellate Court in the decree of the Court below, as to the rate of interest awarded, but in other respects the decree was affirmed, both parties were directed to pay their own costs of appeal (3) No costs have been given where the parties maintained pleas far in excess of their respective legal rights, (4) or where the appellant has failed as to part of his appeal, (5) or where the appellant has used forged documents (6) Costs occasioned by the introduction of unnecessary and irrelevant matter into the record have been disallowed (7)

A Court may, however, direct that costs shall not follow the event, but if it does, it must be for good cause, and its reasons must be stated in writing, a provision enacted both to secure a proper exercise of discretion and in order that the Court of Appeal may be in a position to control the order. It is not possible to define what is good cause. The rule laid down in Cooper v Whittingham (8) that "where a plaintiff comes to enforce a legal right, and there has been no misconduct on his part, the Court cannot take away his right to costs," has been adopted in this country (9) and by the Court of Appeal in England. But the same Court has held (10) that misconduct was not necessary to constitute good cause for depriving a successful plaintiff of costs. "Everything which increases the litigation and the costs, and which places upon the defendant a burden which he ought not to bear in the course of that litigation, is perfectly 'good cause' for depriving the plaintiff of his costs" (11). The Court may consider not merely the conduct of the party in the actual litigation, but may take into consideration matters which led up to it (12). Where a defendant has by his misstatements made under circumstances imposing an obligation on him to be truthful brought litigation on himself, and rendered an action against him reasonable there is good cause for depriving him of his costs (13). If the action is frivolous or vexatious the plaintiff may be deprived of costs (1) If the Court thinks that the suit is a vexatious one and that no real damage has been sustained, it may give nominal damages to the plaintiff and award costs to the defendant, as in substance in such a case the defendant succeeds (2) Costs have been disallowed where a party acted with malice and malevolence, (3) as distinguished from mere hardness, in exercising a civil right, (4) and where the defence was found to be false and unscrupulous (5) A party has been refused costs where he induced plaintiff to sue him; (6) or did not raise the plea of jurisdiction on which he succeeded until special appeal (7) It has been held that the fact that a defendant has, previously to a suit being filed, admitted that the money sued for was due was not a ground for depriving plaintiff of his costs (8) This would be so if, though making an admission, a defendant was unwilling or refused to pay But if not so, alter, for the Court may deprive a plaintiff of costs where his suit is needlessly launched (9) See also cases cited ante in connection with appeals to the Courts of this country, or the Privy Council It is not possible to formulate any precise rules As has been well said, "We can get no nearer to a perfect test than the enquiry whether it would be more fair as between the parties that some exception should be made in the special instance to the rule that the costs should follow upon success" (10)

Separate Costs.—Where the interests of the parties are separate and distinct and they have different defences, separate costs should be allowed to each (11), as where the defendants are zemindar and patnidar, whose defences were not necessarily identical, (12) or where, in a suit to recover possession of land, one of the defendants pleaded successfully that he had nothing to do with the land, and the other defendants claimed title, and also succeeded in their defence, (1) or where the defendants were charged with falsely misappropriating property and some of them might have failed in their defence and others succeeded (2) But where the interests of the defendants are the same, as is ordinarily the case with joint holders, (3) or several representatives of the same original mortgagees, (4) or persons are sued for damages on a cause of action common to all, (5) in short, where the defences are common and identical and not separate, or from any cause defendants file separate defences unnecessarily, (6) only one set of costs should be awarded

Calculation of Costs—In the High Courts, rules exist under which there is a regular scale of costs and the parties' costs are taxed according to this scale. Pleders' fees must also be calculated according to the rules governing them (7). The scale on which costs should be awarded to a defendant depends on what the plaintiff claims against him, (8) and so where in a suit for partition two widows who had a claim for maintenance only were made parties their pleders were held entitled to percentage only on the amount claimed by them for maintenance (9). When a suit contains several distinct claims against separate defendants, the amount of costs to be allowed to each depends on the claims against him (10). Where co-sharers were made defendants in order to plaintiff obtaining a complete decree the plaintiff must, it was held, pay costs sufficient to cover expenses of appearance (11). As against his own clients, in the absence of any rule or express agreement a pleader is only entitled to reasonable remuneration for his work and labour (12). Costs in an application for revocation of probate have been assessed as in a miscellaneous proceeding (13). The costs which a defeated plaintiff should be required to pay are those necessarily incurred by the successful party in the defence in the suit. Costs cannot be deemed necessary if by reasonable diligence on the part of the defendant or his pleader the expenditure of them could be avoided (14). Among items which have been allowed are salary of accountant (15) expenses in

Execution for Costs—The portion of sect 220 as relating to execution is omitted See now sect 36 If the order for costs forms part of a decree such decree is executed in the ordinary way Where, in a partition suit, the plaintiff, after decree, took no steps, but the estate was partitioned at the instance of one of the defendants, it was held that he must first obtain an order for payment, and if payment be not obtained then apply for execution (3) If the order does not form part of the decree it may be executed as if it were a decree for the payment of money But such an order is not a decree (4) A mamlatdar has the same power to levy costs decreed by the High Court as he has regarding costs decreed in his own court (5) No separate suit lies for the recovery of costs awardable under the Code, a remedy in execution being given (6) But where a Court is not entitled to order costs and costs are incurred, they may be made the subject of consideration in a subsequent suit (7) If it can order costs and does not do so, no separate suit will lie (8) An objection as to costs is a matter which should be raised in the shape of an application to amend or review the original decree, and failing that, by way of regular appeal against the decree, but no objection can be raised in execution of it (9) A summary remedy for payment of costs against his client has been given to solicitors, but they cannot under the rule of Court so giving it enforce payment against the client's representatives (10)

Set off of costs—O XX r 6 enacts that "The Court may direct that the costs payable to one party by the other shall be set off against the sum which is admitted or found to be due from the former to the latter" This rule, which is a re-enactment of sect 221 of the last Code, is one of those sections in which the general equitable principle of set off is recognized See note to O VIII r 6, post A mortgagor is entitled to set off or deduct the amount of costs payable to him under the decree against or from the mortgage debt payable by him (11) The section has been applied by analogy of deduction of costs from the purchase money in pre-emption suits (1) A set-off cannot be allowed for costs not actually awarded and a decree which is incapable of being enforced cannot be set off against a decree which is alive (2)

Interest on costs.—Interest cannot be allowed on costs where the decree itself is silent on the point, unless submission is made by the parties to the discretion of the Court (3) The view once taken that sect 222 and sect 209 of the last Code did not affect the special provisions as to allowance of interest in the Transfer of Property Act (4) has been dissented from and overruled (5)

Appeal as to costs.—It was proposed to enact in sect 96, post, that “No appeal shall lie on a matter of costs only where by law such costs are left to the discretion of the Court, except by leave of the Appellate Court, obtained on an application accompanied by a memorandum of appeal” As, however, objection was taken the clause has been omitted with the result that the matter is still regulated by the previous case law Under the Code of 1859 it was held that a regular appeal would lie on a mere question of costs, although as the lower Court had a discretion in the matter, any interference with its order ought also to be exercised with discretion Though, however, an improper exercise of discretion might be matter of regular appeal, no special appeal would lie unless the award of costs was contrary to law (6) A similar rule was laid down (7) under the Code of 1877 Under the last Code first appeals were given not merely from decrees but also from any part of the decrees, (8)

and necessarily therefore against the part of the decree awarding costs. But such an award was then, as before, a matter of discretion, and the Court of Appeal would generally only interfere where a matter of principle was involved, (1) whether in first appeal from a decree (2) or order, (3) or in second appeal (4). The Court has also held its interference justifiable in first appeal where, though strictly speaking no question of principle is involved, there has either been misapprehension as to facts or no real exercise of discretion at all (5).

The Bombay High Court, (6) citing certain English decisions, has held that the principle to be deduced from them is that Appeal Courts should interfere with the exercise of discretion by the lower Courts as to costs when there has been any violation of any established principle, (7) misapprehension of facts, (8) or where there has been no real exercise of discretion at all (9). These principles will be of general application in first appeals and appeals from orders. In the case of second appeals it must be shown that the order complained of comes within the provisions of sect. 100.

PART II.

EXECUTION.

GENERAL.

36 The provisions of this Code relating to the execution of decrees shall, so far as they are applicable, be deemed to apply to the execution of orders
Application to orders

Orders—This section replaces and supersedes the first paragraph of sect 649 of the last Code, the second paragraph being incorporated in the next section. By virtue of sect 647 (now 141) and sect 649 of the Code of 1882, it was held that an order obtained from a Judge in Chambers by an attorney against his client for payment of costs might be executed under Chapter XIX of the Code of 1882, corresponding with the present Part (1). By virtue of sect 649 of the last Code, execution might have been had of a judgment entered up under sect 86 of the Insolvent Act (2).

Execution—Execution is the enforcement by process of Court of its decrees and orders. The words “execution of decrees” at the head of the Chapter in the last Code was held to mean the enforcement of the decrees of Courts by process of execution only, viz the different kind of execution dealt with in the Chapter for compelling the judgment debtor to obey the order of the Court (3). Process in execution must always be granted by the direct act of the Court itself. And as parties cannot invoke the process de novo either by agreement or by their conduct so neither can they extend the relief which the Court has chosen to award (4). Primâ facie it is the right of every litigant to call on the Courts to take such action as may be requisite to secure the execution of a decree containing a direction in his favour, and the Court of execution cannot impose terms which are not in the decree (5). ought not to be conducted in a slipshod and slovenly fashion, as if it were an unimportant branch of the work they have to do in the administration of justice but it ought to be conducted with as much care as the procedure in suits because of the difficulties which so frequently arise. The Courts are bound to look to the Code for the procedure they should follow in these execution proceedings (1)

"Provisions of this Code"—This Part, together with O XXI, replaces Chapter XIX of the Code of 1882. The provisions relating to execution have been divided into two portions, viz those contained in the present Part, and those contained in the Rules of O XXI, which must be read with it. These Rules refer to minor points of procedure. The arrangement and numbering of this Part has been very materially altered, and sections appearing in it have been taken from other portions of the old Code. Further, the sections of the Code reproduced have been added to, and made the subject of important amendments, which, for the most part, embody or have been suggested by previous case law. A considerable number of the sections or portions of the sections are entirely new.

Firstly, the Code is declared applicable to decrees and orders, and a definition given of the term "Court which passed the decree" (sects 36, 37) [transfers of decrees to the Collectors for execution are dealt with in sects 68-72 and the Third Schedule]. Then follow provisions relating to the Courts by which decrees may be executed, and the jurisdiction of such Courts (sects 38-46), thirdly, the questions to be determined by those Courts (sect 47, formerly 244), fourthly, the limit of time for execution (sect 48), fifthly and sixthly, transferees, legal representatives, and procedure in execution respectively (sects 49-54), seventhly, the mode of execution, whether by arrest, attachment, or sale (sects 55-72), eighthly, payment and distribution of assets (sect 75), and lastly, the resistance to execution (sect 74). Other provisions concerning these matters are contained in the 103 rules of O XXI.

The main alterations to be noted in the sections are as follows: the introduction of precepts (sect 16), and of sects 53, 61, and amendments of sect 241 (now sect 47), and of the sections corresponding with sects 51, 55 (1) (2) 62, 64, 73. As regards sects 68 et seq, dealing with execution by Collectors, the provisions, as they deal with a special matter, and are not of general application, have been placed in the Third Schedule.

The alterations in the rules are cited under O XXI.

The chief omissions in the sections are of clauses (a) and (b) of the former sect 241 (see notes to sect 17) and of sect 288 of the last Code, which it was considered might be omitted, having regard to the provisions of Act XVIII of 1850. Sect 257A of the last Code has also been omitted. It was first enacted by Act XII of 1879, with a view to protect the interests of judgment debtors against undue pressure by decree holders. The Select Committee stated that the section had given rise to conflicting decisions and as interpreted by the majority of the High Courts, was found in practice to be of little service to judgment debtors. Moreover, sect 16 of the Indian

(1) Bhakur Pershad v. Shukh Fakirullah, 22 F. 11 at pp 45, 46 (1891)

Contract Act, as amended, was considered to afford adequate protection where it is required. As, however, the section remains in force until the coming into operation of the present Code, and some cases decided under it have a relation to sect 258 (now O XXI r 2), the following notes on the section are given.

Object of section 257A of last Code, now omitted—The Legislature considered that the power of executing a decree placed the holder of it in a position to exercise undue pressure over the judgment debtor and enabled him to obtain terms too favourable to himself from the latter, whose interests needed protection at the hands of the Court which passed the decree (1). The object is to avoid inconvenience and delay in executing the decree and its being held in terrorem over the debtor, and to afford protection against unfair arrangements, which protection is insured by the necessity for sanction (2).

"The Court"—It was held under the last Code that the Court to which a decree had been transferred for execution could not pass an order under this section and that sanction could be given only by the Court which passed the decree (3).

"Shall be void"—Under the last Code an agreement of the nature stated was declared to be void, and a question arose whether it was void in toto and for all purposes or for the purposes of execution proceedings only, and was enforceable by a fresh suit (4). It is not easy to reconcile all the decisions on the point. There is no absolute prohibition against such an agreement. The section, however, forbids the enforcement of an agreement entered into in contravention of the section, while a decree is subsisting and enforceable. If that be so then the decree must be enforced by execution and not by separate suit, and in such execution an unsanctioned agreement will not be recognized. If however an agreement is such that it adjusts and puts an end to the decree which thus ceases to be enforceable no question of or in execution arises, and the substituted agreement may be made the subject of a fresh suit (5).

"Every agreement"—The agreement referred to to give time is an agreement to pay the judgment debt with a stipulation that it shall not be payable at the time when under the decree it became payable. An agreement to give time for the satisfaction of a judgment implies ex vi termini that there has been no actual satisfaction but merely a stipulation for future satisfaction. Therefore an agreement under which there is an actual and present satisfaction of the judgment replacing it and putting an end to the decree is not within the section. In other words, the agreement to which the section relates is one which suspends and does not destroy the rights of execution consequent on the decree (1). The last clause presupposes the existence of a judgment debt, for the sum paid cannot be applied in satisfaction unless there is a subsisting judgment to which it can be applied. Where the judgment debt is extinguished in whole or in part by the substitution for it of a contract, such a contract cannot be regarded as an agreement to give time for the satisfaction of a judgment debt, since the latter, to the extent to which it has been extinguished, is no longer in existence. The agreement in such a case is only an adjustment of the decree under O XXI r 2, which, if not certified, will not prevent execution.

(5) See cases cited in last note. In Govind Krishna v Sakharani 28 B 383 (1904) these cases were not referred to. In Venkata Subramania Ayyar v Koran Kannan Ahmed, 26 M 19 (1902) at p 26 it was pointed out that in Hukum Chand Aswal v Taharunnissa Bibi 16 C 504 (1889) there was no agreement by the judgment-creditor to surrender his rights under the decree, and that being so the case was, upon the principles above stated, wrongly decided.

tions are not part and one from the other (4). The section did not apply to agreements by persons who are not parties to the suit in which the original decree was made (5). Persons who have nothing to do with a decree cannot fall within the mischief struck at by the section. But the same consideration cannot apply where a person is substantially bound by the decree though not pro forma a party to it (6). It was held that an agreement was none the less void because one of the parties to it, who was the legal representative of one of the judgment debtors, had not been one of the parties to the suit in which the decree was obtained (7).

Enforceable—It was held under the last Code that the section must be deemed to relate to judgment debts which are still enforceable (8).

"Sanction"—Where no formal sanction had been recorded it was held that under the circumstances sufficient had been done to satisfy the requirements of the section (1) As regards time for sanction see below (2) and as to the effect of want of sanction see ante The new agreement when sanctioned became part of the decree and could be executed as the decree in the case (3) The parties could not resile from the agreement so sanctioned and if there was irregularity in the sanction not amounting to want of jurisdiction the compromise must take effect until the order sanctioning it is set aside (4) An order passed under this section being one relating to the execution of the decree was appealable (5)

What decree may be executed.—The rule may shortly be stated to be—the decree of the Court of first instance until appeal and after that the decree of the Court of last instance Whether the decree of the appellate Court is for reversing or for affirming the decree against which the appeal is preferred it is, in either case, the final decree in the cause and as such the only decree which is capable of being enforced by execution after it is once pronounced If the decree of the lower Court is reversed it is absolutely dead and gone, if it is affirmed or modified it is equally so though in a different way namely by being merged in the decree of the superior Court which takes its place for all intents and purposes (6) If it is altered by the Court of first instance execution cannot issue (7) But where the appellate decree is not complete in itself reference may be made to the prior decree (1) The decree however which is executed is the appellate decree Where a decree was compromised by agreement made by the parties and communicated to the Court which passed the decree, held that the effect of the decree was extinguished by the agreement which could only be enforced by a fresh suit and not by an application for execution of the former decree (2) When a decree contains a direction for payment and creates a charge and default is made, the decree cannot be at once executed the proper course for its enforcement is not to apply for execution, but to apply for either an order for an account and sale or to institute a suit for enforcing the charge (3)

From which Court execution may be had—See the notes to sects 37, 38, 68-72, and Third Schedule The general jurisdiction of such Courts is dealt with post Sects 43, 44, 45 deal with execution of decrees passed by British Courts either in places to which this Part does not extend such as those scheduled districts to which the Code or this portion of it has not been extended execution of decrees passed by Courts of Native States, and issue of precepts to certain British Courts in foreign territory The Courts, therefore, by which execution may be given are Courts in British India executing either their own decrees or the decrees of other Courts in British India or Courts in British India executing the decrees of British Courts in foreign territory (sect 43) or Native Courts of such territory (sect 44) There remains the question of execution of decrees of British Indian Courts out of British Indian territory As regards this, the general principle is that Courts of British India have no authority to send their decrees for execution to Courts not in British India (4) An exception to this rule exists (sect 45) in the case of British Courts in foreign territory, provided that such execution is authorized under the notification of the Governor general (5)

a mortgage or charge against immoveable property included therein or subject thereto, shall have power to order the sale of any such immoveable property, wherever the same may be situate

(3) Where, after the passing of a decree in a suit for the enforcement of a mortgage or charge, the whole of the immoveable property included therein or subject thereto falls, by transfer of jurisdiction, within the local limits of the jurisdiction of another Court, the decree may be executed either by the Court which passed the decree, or by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the immoveable property falls by such transfer

(4) Save as provided by this section and section 158 [dealing with attachment of salary] no Court shall have power to execute a decree in which the subject matter of the suit or application for execution is property situate entirely outside the local limits of its jurisdiction

(5) Where immoveable property attached in execution of a decree for the payment of money forms one estate comprised within the local limits of the jurisdiction of two or more Courts, any one of such Courts may order the sale of the entire estate upon such conditions as it may consider reasonable and necessary for the prevention of conflict of orders

Explanation—For the purposes of this section, a Court, which would have been competent to pass the decree, shall not be deemed to be incompetent to execute it merely because, by reason of the amount of rent or mesne profits ascertained for a period subsequent to the institution of the suit, the pecuniary limits of the jurisdiction of such Court are exceeded

This section would have cleared up several points which have been the subject of judicial decision. The Court executing the decree referred to is as appears from sect 38 either the Court which passed the decree or the Court to which it is sent for execution. Clause (5) with some modifications has been embodied in O XXI r 3. The other clauses have not been enacted as however they have reference to preceding case law they are here reproduced and commented upon.

Clause (1)—There has been a conflict of decision on the question whether the Court executing a transferred decree was restricted to the pecuniary limits of its jurisdiction (1). An application for the execution of a decree however is an application in the suit in which the decree was obtained and questions arising in the execution of decrees are frequently as important as the questions in issue in the suit. The proposed clause adopted the principle of those decisions which held that a Court had no jurisdiction to execute a decree sent to it when the decree had been passed in a suit, the value or subject matter of which was in excess of the pecuniary limits of its ordinary jurisdiction and that the power to send a decree to "another Court" meant another Court having jurisdiction, and competent to execute that decree, having regard to the amount or value of the subject matter of its ordinary jurisdiction. The words "at the time of its institution" were introduced to declare beyond doubt that a Court having jurisdiction to grant a decree has also authority to execute it, even though the pecuniary limits of its jurisdiction may be subsequently exceeded by the operation of incidental causes, such as a rise in the value of property or the gradual accumulation of interest (1). With this Clause should be read the Explanation, which was intended to give effect to the undermentioned decision (2). This Explanation was confined to cases of rent or mesne profits but, as stated, the principle is one of general application, and has been applied in cases of interest also.

Clauses (2) and (3)—These both refer to suits on mortgages and charges, and form an exception to the general principle enacted in the fourth Clause of the proposed section. They embody the result of the decisions noted (3) in which it was held that it would be impossible to apply the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act relating to sales in accordance with the decree passed in a suit on a mortgage if it were necessary to apply to different Courts to obtain realization of the mortgaged debt by sale of the properties hypothecated. It was, however, pointed out that the Court passing the decree is not alone competent, for in some cases it might be more convenient that sales of various lots mortgaged should be held in the Districts in which they are situate (4). Moreover, a sale under a mortgage decree is not in its proper sense a sale in execution, being a sale directed by the decree itself (5).

Clause (4)—If at the time a suit is brought a Court has no territorial jurisdiction over the subject matter, then it has no jurisdiction to execute such decree. Sect. 16 indicates that the object of the Code is to limit the territorial jurisdiction of the Courts in regard to the property they are entitled to deal with, and as execution is only a continuation of the suit a Court in the later stages of a suit has no greater powers than it possessed at its institution. Moreover (and this applies to all cases whether the decree is that of the Court

Clause (5)—This is a provision inserted for convenience it being obviously undesirable in many cases, and in others not practicable, that an entire estate should be sold otherwise than as a whole (2) An estate forming one revenue-paying unit but extending over more than one District, may be regarded as situate in the District where the whole revenue is paid or where the Court holding the sale has jurisdiction This clause therefore forms another exception to the general principle upon which the fourth clause is based, in so far as authority is given to sell beyond local limits in execution of a simple money decree (3) which authority may be exercised upon reasonable conditions by any Court of competent pecuniary jurisdiction within which any portion of the estate is situated With some verbal alterations and the omission of the words "attached in execution of a decree for the payment of money" this clause has been retained and appears as O XXI r 3

(a) where the decree to be executed has been passed in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction, the Court of first instance, and

(b) where the Court of first instance has ceased to exist or to have jurisdiction to execute it, the Court which, if the suit wherein the decree was passed was instituted at the time of making the application for the execution of the decree, would have jurisdiction to try such suit.

"Include"—This section corresponds with the second paragraph of sect 649 of the last Code as amended by Act XII of 1879, which explained the meaning of the expression the "Court which passed the decree" This does not exclude the Court which originally passed the decree as being a Court in which an application for execution should be made, but merely includes another Court (1) In clause (a) the expression "Court of first instance" has been substituted for "Court which passed the decree from which the appeal was preferred," the reason being that as a matter of practice, the Court of intermediate appeal never executes a decree passed on second appeal The meaning of the words "ceased to exist or to have jurisdiction to execute it" are explained in the under mentioned cases (2) The terms of clause (b) are general and draw no distinction as to the nature of the cause which puts an end to the jurisdiction (3) It was held under the last Code that the Court to which a decree was transferred for execution, if it had ceased to have territorial jurisdiction might either of its own motion or when applied to under sect 223 of that Code, transfer it for execution to the Court which had territorial jurisdiction, (4) and that a comparison of that section with the last paragraph of section 649, corresponding with this section, indicated that territorial jurisdiction is a condition precedent to a Court executing a decree (5) This is so now

COURTS BY WHICH DECREES MAY BE EXECUTED.

38. A decree may be executed either by the Court which Court by which decree passed it, or by the Court to which it is sent may be executed. for execution.

Courts of Execution.—Under sect 223 of the last Code also a decree might have been executed either by the Court which passed it or by the Court to which it was transferred for execution under the circumstances mentioned in that section by the former Court. According to this procedure, the Court which passed the decree was after transfer virtually deprived of control until the decree was returned, and to all intents and purposes execution was everywhere in suspense except in the particular Court which happened to have the decree on its file. The Court to which the decree was transferred had seizin of the execution proceedings, and carried them on until as far as possible execution was obtained. The decree might then have been transferred to another Court, and the process repeated until full execution was had. Though the legality of concurrent execution has been recognized, (1) both under the Codes of 1859 and 1877, as well as that of 1882, in practice it was not generally carried out. The Court to which the decree was transferred could not, after executing it as far as it could, transfer it directly to a third Court. It had to send it back to the Court which passed the decree, which might then transfer it to a third Court, a procedure which was cumbersome and caused delay. (2) It was at first considered in Committee that the results of the transfer system, which seriously affected the chances of realization and added greatly to the expenses eventually to be borne by the judgment debtor, were not justified by any compensating advantage. Excess in realization which the former system was primarily introduced to prevent, could, they considered, be quite as effectively obviated by reserving the power of ordering attachment or sale to the Court which passed the decree and which would not issue a precept for either of these purposes unless, looking to the amount of assets obtained from all sources, it considered such action to be necessary. Special limitations were later placed on this power. It was proposed that the Court which passed a decree should be responsible throughout for seeing it enforced and the Court to which the precept was issued should have jurisdiction only to entertain objections not affecting the legality or propriety of the precept or the right to execute the decree. It was thus proposed to effect an important simplification of procedure by substituting execution by precept for the former procedure by transfer of the decree. This would have involved two results, viz., firstly, concurrent execution as opposed to the former practice under which there was only one Court at one time carrying out the execution of a decree, and, secondly, execution by one Court (that to which the precept is given) under the direction of another Court (or that which passed the decree) as opposed to the former practice under which the Court in which the execution proceedings were pending had control of them. The Court passing the decree might thus have executed the decree itself, and might at the same time have issued precepts to another Court or to two or more Courts directing simultaneous execution of the decree. The conduct of the execution would have remained in the hands of the Court passing the decree, which might from time to time give such directions as it thought fit regarding the execution to the Court to which the precept is issued, whose powers were stated and limited. The adoption of the precept system would of necessity have abolished the elaborate conditions of transfer embodied in sect 223 of the last Code. The Select Committee, which, however, considered the Draft Bill immediately prior to its introduction, considered that the difficulties in the existing system arose not so much from the machinery of execution itself as from the defective manner in which it was worked. They therefore stated that they were unable to accept the proposal of the Committee of 1902 in relation to the execution of decrees by precept. They were, however, so far in accord with the view expressed by that Committee as to have been able to insert sect 16, post, enabling the Court which passed the decree to issue a precept to any other Court to attach property of the judgment debtor pending execution in the ordinary course. Beyond this they stated they felt they could not safely go. With this exception, therefore, the general system of execution viz, by the Court passing the decree or by transfer has been maintained.

The section provides that a decree may be executed by the Court which passed it, and it was held that where a Court passed a decree for sale of property, and the place where such property was situate was transferred to the jurisdiction of another Court, the former Court might still execute the decree (1). It has been held that the provisions of this section read with those of the next section plainly indicate that as a general rule (to which there are sundry exceptions) no Court can execute a decree in which the subject matter of the suit or of the application for execution is property entirely outside its local jurisdiction (2).

39 (1) The Court which passed a decree may, on the application of the decree-holder, send it for execution to another Court,—

Transfer of decree.

- (a) if the person against whom the decree is passed actually and voluntarily resides or carries on business, or personally works for gain, within the local limits of the jurisdiction of such other Court, or
- (b) if such person has not property within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree, sufficient to satisfy such decree and has property within the local limits of the jurisdiction of such other Court, or

(c) if the decree directs the sale or delivery of immoveable property situate outside the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court which passed it, or

(d) if the Court which passed the decree considers for any other reason, which it shall record in writing, that the decree should be executed by such other Court.

(2) The Court which passed a decree may of its own motion send it for execution to any subordinate Court of competent jurisdiction.

40. Where a decree is sent for execution in another province, it shall be sent to such Court and executed in such manner as may be prescribed by rules in force in that province.

Transfer of decree to Court in another province.

41. The Court to which a decree is sent for execution shall certify to the Court which passed it the fact of such execution, or where the former Court fails to execute the same the circumstances attending such failure.

Result of execution proceedings to be certified.

Transfer of decree.—As sect 38 embodies the first paragraph of sect 223 of the last Code, sect 39 embodies the second and third paragraphs, sect 41 the fourth paragraph, and O XXI rr 4 and 5 the fifth and concluding paragraphs of that section. See notes to sects 36–38, ante, and to the last-mentioned rules in O XXI, post. To make the provisions relating to the transmission of decrees applicable, it is necessary that the provisions of the Code should regulate the procedure of both the Courts (1) Where a decree has been transferred by a Court which passed it to another Court for execution, the original Court, it has been held, does not thereby completely lose all jurisdiction in respect of execution thereof (2) As to orders sending certificates for execution under the Public Demands Recovery Act, see case cited (3) Where in different districts different modes of execution are prescribed, and where the question is how a decree passed in one, but of which execution is sought in another of such districts, is to be executed, the executing Court must be guided by the rules in force in its own district (4) It has been held under sect 233 of the last Code that an application for transfer of decree is an application to take a step in aid of execution within the meaning of Art 182 of the Limitation Act of 1908 (5)

42 The Court executing a decree sent to it shall have the same powers in executing such decree as if it has been passed by itself. All persons disobeying or obstructing the execution of the decree shall be punishable by such Court in the same manner as if it had passed the decree. And its order in executing such decree shall be subject to the same rules in respect of appeal as if the decree had been passed by itself.

Limitation of Powers—The powers of a Court are subject to other sections of the Code, which may affect them. So the section corresponding to this in the Code of 1882 was held subject to the special provisions of the section corresponding to O XXI r 16 post (1). Under the Code of 1882, the Court to which the decree was sent was, by virtue of the provisions of sect 225 (now O XXI r 7), held entitled to enquire into the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree (2). And if the Court to which the decree was sent held that there was no jurisdiction, then its hands were stayed and the parties had to go back to the Court which passed the decree, the Court to which the decree was sent having declined to become the executing Court within the of the decree was barred by limitation or not, (4) but not where a Court made an order for execution of the decree and then transmitted it (5). It has been held that an order for the transmission of a decree for execution to another Court is not an order for the execution of the decree, nor is the application for the transmission an application for execution (6).

As illustrations of the limitation on its powers, the following decisions under the earlier Codes may be referred to as being in force under this Code. The executing Court cannot question the validity of the decree or any portion of it. Its duty is to enforce it and not to determine whether it was illegal.

"Same powers"—While the functions of an executing Court are confined to effecting execution, and to matters arising out of the proceedings in execution (2) and are subject to the limitations above mentioned they are yet judicial and not merely ministerial functions (3). So a Court to which a decree has been sent has power to make orders in execution of the decree to deal with obstruction to execution, to investigate claims of third parties to attached property, and the like. It may generally be stated that the Court to which a decree is sent has the same power as those which were possessed by a Court to which a decree was transferred for execution under the Code of 1882.

Execution of decrees passed by British Courts in places to which this Part does not extend or in foreign territory

Decrees of British Courts where provisions do not extend—The first part of this section was enacted because formerly a decree obtained in a scheduled District to which the provisions of Chapter XIX of the Code of 1882 had not been extended, could not be executed under the Code (4). It was determined therefore to revert to the provisions of sect. 294 of the Code of 1859, which placed such decrees on a footing as regards execution with those obtained in a foreign Court.

the authority of the Governor General in Council, on any class of such decrees, may be executed in British India as if they had been passed by the Courts of British India.

"May be executed."—This section, it was held, did not remove the decree of a Native State falling within its purview from the category of foreign judgments. A Court in British India, though it may, is not bound to, execute the foreign decree, and will not do so if it is shown to have been without jurisdiction or obtained by fraud (1). The judgment of a foreign Court on a decree obtained in British India is no bar to the execution of the original decree (2). As to foreign judgments generally, see sects 11-13, ante, proof (3) and execution (4) of foreign decrees, cases cited.

45. So much of the foregoing sections of this Part as empowers a Court to send a decree for execution to another Court shall be construed as empowering a Court in British India to send a decree for execution to any Court established or continued by the authority of the Governor General in Council in the territories of any foreign Prince or State to which the Governor General in Council has, by notification in the Gazette of India, declared this section to apply.

Execution of decrees in foreign territory.—This section was inserted in the Code of 1882 by sect 24, Act VII of 1888. The tributary Mahals of Orissa do not form part of British India, and therefore in the absence of a prior notification in the India Gazette as specified in this section, it was held that no decree by a Court in British India could be sent for execution into a territory such as Mayoorbhunj which is a tributary Mahal (5). An instance of a Court "established or continued" within the meaning of this section is the Court of the Political Agent at Siklām (6).

Provided that no attachment under a precept shall continue for more than two months unless the period of attachment is extended by an order of the Court which passed the decree or unless before the determination of such attachment the decree has been transferred to the Court by which the attachment has been made and the decree holder has applied for an order for the sale of such property.

Precepts—See as to this section the notes to sect 38, ante. As regards this section the Report of the Select Committee states —“Though a system of execution based on precepts is, in the opinion of the Committee open to grave objection, they think the idea may be utilized for the purpose of enabling a decree holder to obtain an interim attachment when there is ground to apprehend that he may otherwise be deprived of the fruits of his decree. They have for this purpose introduced clause 46 into the Bill. They think it expedient to fix a time limit for the continuance of this interim attachment, but at the same time they have empowered the Court to extend the period to meet the exigencies of particular cases. After careful consideration they have come to the conclusion that notwithstanding attachment under a precept re attachment on the ordinary application for execution will still be necessary. Though at first sight it may appear a better course to provide that re attachment shall not be necessary when the issue of a precept is followed by the ordinary application for execution after careful consideration they have come to the conclusion that it will be safer to require re attachment having regard to the agency by which execution is carried into effect.” The section, therefore, originally contained a third clause as follows —“Notwithstanding anything contained in this section, it shall be incumbent on the decree holder to apply for execution as though no precept had been issued.” This, however, was later in Council struck out.

QUESTIONS TO BE DETERMINED BY COURT EXECUTING DECREE

47. (1) All questions arising between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed, or their representatives, and relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree, shall be determined by the Court executing the decree and not by a separate suit

Questions to be determined by the Court executing decree

(2) The Court may, subject to any objection as to limitation or jurisdiction, treat a proceeding under this section as a suit or a suit as a proceeding and may, if necessary, order payment of any additional court fees

(3) Where a question arises as to whether any person is or is not the representative of a party, such question shall, for the purposes of this section, be determined by the Court.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section, a plaintiff whose suit has been dismissed and a defendant against whom a suit has been dismissed, are parties to the suit.

History and Scope of Section.—The provisions of this important [s. section are designed to prevent multiplicity of suits and to secure that all matters which can be decided in the suit should be so decided. The subject-matter has been repeatedly considered both by the Legislature since it was first statutorily dealt with in sect 11, Act XXIII of 1861, amending the Code of 1859, as also by the Courts, which have given numerous and often conflicting decisions on points which have arisen with reference to it. The tendency both of the Legislature and, on the whole, of the Courts has been to enlarge as much as possible the scope of the proceedings before Courts charged with the execution of the decree. With this view the statutory law has been amended from time to time. Sect 11 of Act XXIII of 1861, which referred expressly only to parties and not representatives, and not to discharge, satisfaction or stay, ran as follows —

“All questions regarding the amount of any mesne profits which by the terms of the decree may have been reserved for adjustment in the execution of the decree, or of any mesne profits or interest which may be payable in respect of the subject-matter of a suit between the date of the institution of the suit and execution of the decree, as well as questions relating to sums alleged to have been paid in discharge or satisfaction of the decree or the like, and any other questions arising between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed and relating to the execution of the decree, shall be determined by order of the Court executing the decree and not by separate suit, and the order passed by the Court shall be open to appeal.”

This enactment was followed by the Code of 1877 (Act X). This Code expressly referred to representatives, and was in its terms the same as those of the Code of 1882, as the latter was first published, except that the words “discharge” and “satisfaction” appeared for the first time in the Code of 1882 (Act XIV). The latter Code was amended by Act VII of 1888. Sect 26 of that amending Act substituted a new clause (c) for that which appeared in sect 244 of that Code prior to this amendment. The amended clause (c) included cases of stay of execution as to which there had been some difference of opinion whether, as suspending execution, it was a matter relating to execution. Act VII of 1888 also added the last clause of sect 244 of the former Code which corresponds with subsection (3) of the present Code though the latter has been amended.

It will be observed that the present Code effects several amendments. In the first place clause (a) of sect 244 of the last Code has not been re-enacted. That clause ran (a) “questions regarding the amount of any mesne profits as to which the decree has directed inquiry.” All reference to mesne profits has now been omitted. This omission is due to the recognition of the principle that inquiries into the amount of mesne profits are properly not a matter for the execution department but should be treated as an integral is anything due on it, (1) questions as to part satisfaction of a decree (2) Suit by judgment debtor against auction purchaser to recover property sold in execution, on the ground that being a tenant's right it is not saleable (3) When a prior mortgagee has been made a party in a puisne mortgagee's suit, and the puisne mortgagee has obtained a decree for sale on his mortgage, the prior mortgagee can have his rights settled in execution-proceedings by an application under this section (4)

What a decree means is a question relating to execution, and a suit therefore which asks the Court to construe a decree and ascertain plaintiff's rights is barred, notwithstanding that other parties against whom no relief is claimed are added (5) So also is an objection to a partition made by a Collector, (6) an order refusing a representative of a deceased decree holder his claim to continue the execution proceedings, (7) an order declining to enlarge the time fixed for redemption (8)

It is to be observed (and this is not always understood) that an order may be, none the less, an order under this section because it is also passed under some other of the sections of the Code relating to the execution of decrees. So orders under the following sections of the last Code have been held to be also orders under sect 224 of that Code corresponding with the present section —sects 318 and 334, (9) sect 310, (10) sect 287, clause (8), (11) sect 294, clause (2), (12) sect 294, last clause, (13) sect 243, (14) sects 232, 234 (15) In such cases the matter is one ordinarily and from the nature of the case relating to execution within the meaning of this section. sale was invalid, (1) an application to allow execution proceedings to be re opened, (2) a suit by surety for declaration of non liability as to portion of decree (3)

A case is not within the section if it is a question which does not relate to, and is not directly connected with, the execution of the decree, even though between the same parties, (4) that is, if it is not a question in respect to the furtherance of or hindrance to or the manner of carrying out the execution of the decree, (5) or does not arise between the parties to the suit in which the order was passed, (6) or is a question which cannot be properly determined in execution, (7) or if it is an order not in execution, such as an interlocutory order pending suit appointing a commission to make partition subsequently to a preliminary decree (8) or if it indirectly and remotely relates to the execution of the decree, (9) or the decree has been satisfied, (10) or if an order is made not in execution of decree but after execution and when such proceedings have come to an end, (11) or the question is one not under but outside the decree, such as assessment of damages for excessive execution, (12) or for damages for injury to property after it had vested in him on the confirmation of the sale (13)

The section does not apply where the decree has passed beyond the stage of execution and the Court is functus officio. So it does not apply to a suit by one of two judgment-debtors who has been compelled to satisfy the decree against the other judgment debtor for contribution, (14) nor where a person

Fraud.—It was well settled law under sect. 211 of the last Code that when circumstances affecting the validity of a sale in execution had been brought about by the fraud of one of the parties to the suit or the auction purchaser and gave rise to a question between these parties such as apart from fraud, would be within the provisions of that section a suit would not lie to impeach the validity of the sale on the ground of such fraud (6).

This rule was, of course, subject to this, that the other conditions of the section existed, viz, that the question was one arising between the parties to the suit or their representatives. So it was held that as between a party to the suit and a stranger, the provisions of sect 312 of the former Code did not debar the person aggrieved from instituting a suit, if he could establish that a material error in the sale had its origin not in mere irregularity but in fraud (1). So also in the under-mentioned case, (2) while the suit was held to be barred as regards those plaintiffs who were parties to the suit the sale in which was sought to be set aside, it was held to lie at the instance of the other plaintiffs who had been no parties to such suit.

It was held that when a decree or purchase was made benami, sect 244 did not apply, and a suit would lie, as the section could not be applied on the footing that the persons really interested were parties to the proceeding (3) and that the auction purchaser could not be regarded as a party to the suit (4). Though this case was not referred to, it must be taken on this latter point to have been overruled (5) by the decision of the Privy Council, that when a question relating to execution has arisen between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed, the fact that the purchaser, who is not party to the suit, is interested in the result is not a bar to the application of the section (6). A judgment-debtor was held entitled by an application under sect 244 to have an execution sale of his properties set aside if he alleged and proved fraud on the part of the decree holder, though no fraud was alleged or proved against the auction-purchaser, who was a stranger to the suit. The auction-purchaser was of course entitled to have the purchase money paid by him refunded by the decree-holder. When during the pendency of an application under sect 244 to set aside a sale the sale is confirmed, such confirmation was held to be no bar to the maintenance of the application even though the auction purchaser was a stranger to the suit (7).

An application to set aside a sale on the ground of fraud may be made even after the sale has been confirmed (1)

Where a judgment debtor applies to have an execution sale set aside and alleges circumstances which, if found in his favour, would amount to fraud on the part of the decree holder or auction purchaser the application was held to come under sect 244, something more being alleged than a material irregularity in publishing or conducting the sale within the meaning of sect 311 of the last Code (2) But a mere allegation of fraud without any attempt to substantiate it was insufficient (3)

In order, however, to determine whether a case in which fraud is alleged comes within this section or may be made the subject of a separate suit, it is necessary, apart from any other conditions annexed to the section, to ascertain whether it is the decree or the execution proceedings under the decree which are alleged to be fraudulent Proceedings under this section presuppose the existence of a valid and binding decree (4) The section was held not to apply to a case where the judgment debtor tried to set aside the effect of a decree, but it referred to proceedings in execution based on the decree as if it were perfectly good and valid (5) Under this section the questions to be decided in execution are questions relating to the execution, discharge, or satisfaction of the decree A question whether the decree itself was obtained by fraud or collusion was held not to be one which relates to the execution, discharge, or satisfaction of the decree, but which affects its very subsistence and validity (6) The question whether the decree sought to be executed was obtained by fraud

(2) Nemai Chand Kanji v Deno Nath Kanji, 2 C W N 691 (1898), Bhubun Mohun Pal v Raja Peary Mohun Moskerjee 3 C W N LXXX. (1899) As to these two sections, see judgment of Ghose, J, in Mohendro Narain Chaturaj v Gopal Mondul T B 17 C 769 (1890), in which the learned Judge was of opinion that an application to set aside a sale for fraud was not provided for in the Code either in s 244 or 311, that the executing Court had, however, inherent power to set aside a sale before confirmation, but that after confirmation the Court of execution was functus officio, and that the matter could only be dealt with by separate suit. At one time it was not clearly understood that after a decree had been fully executed the Court could re open the matter under s 244 and set aside a sale already confirmed, but the law was subsequently settled as stated in the text, that an application lay under s 244 whether before or after confirmation of the sale, see Jagan Nath Gorai v Watson & Co, 19 C 311 at p. 344 (1892), and was thus held not to be within the scope of sect 244 (1) and could only be raised by a separate suit (2) When, therefore, both the decree and in consequence the sale thereunder were impeached on the ground of fraud, the remedy lay by separate suit (3) But, as already stated, if the decree was not impeached for fraud but only the execution proceedings thereunder, the question had to be raised in those proceedings and a separate suit would not lie An objection, therefore, to a sale of property in execution of a decree on the ground of fraud is a question to be determined exclusively under this section, even though the purchaser was no party to the decree

“Court executing the decree”—That is, either the Court which passed the decree or the Court to which the decree has been transferred The provisions of this section govern the procedure of both such Courts (4) The words must be interpreted to mean the Court executing the decree at the time when the application is made, and they do not include the Court which has executed the decree and has thereby become functus officio (5) The section is limited to Courts executing the decree, and therefore an order refusing to stay execution by a Court which is not executing the decree is not appealable (6)

“And not by separate suit”—A separate suit ought not to be instituted unless all questions between the parties or their representatives cannot be decided in the original suit, (7) and all questions which can possibly be determined in the execution proceedings should be so determined (8) The existence however, of a decree cannot bar a fresh suit between the parties in respect of rights which cannot be worked out without additions to the decree which the Court of execution has no power to make (9)

It has been held that this section does not absolutely bar a suit, but prohibits in a separate suit between the same parties to a decree, any relief being granted which interferes with the conduct of the execution proceedings of the Court executing a decree (1) In considering whether the scope of any suit comes within the section, regard must be had both to the cause of action and the relief claimed Thus the question of an uncertified adjustment may be a matter relating to execution, and no suit is permissible which has as its object to restrain the execution of the decree on this ground, but it may be that a suit would lie for other relief which had as its subject-matter such uncertified adjustment (2) Further, this section differs from sect 11 which bars the trial of an issue This section bars a suit brought for the determination of certain questions specified therein, but does not bar the trial of any issue involved in those questions if the issue is raised at the instance of a defendant in a suit brought against him (3) Where the execution proceedings are closed, a separate suit will lie, as the section is then no longer applicable (4)

"Arising."—It has been said (5) that this word should be read as "directly arising," otherwise the most remote enquiries would be possible in the execution department Probably, however, it is best not to import words into the section and to determine in each case whether a question does arise which is dealt with by this section

The following considerations establish that for the purposes of this section an objection made by a party to the decree or his representative against whom execution is applied for, to the effect that property is held by him by a right or title not rendering it liable to attachment in execution of such decree, is a question arising between the parties The provision formerly in force corresponding to sect 244, namely, sect 11 of Act XXIII of 1861, was limited in its operation to questions arising between parties to the suit, and the question arose whether the term "parties" applied to persons who had not been made parties before decree but against whom execution was sought as heirs of the judgment-debtor upon his death after decree In the last Code the words "or their representatives" were added and applied to persons against whom, or against the property in whose hands, execution was sought, on the ground that they were the heirs of a judgment debtor who has died after decree As regards the kind of questions intended in sect 244 of that Code the matter was fairly clear from the provisions of sect 234 Under that section (now 50) the representative could have been made liable "to the extent of the property of the deceased which has come to his hands and has not been duly disposed of" So that two kinds of property could be attached First property of the ancestor found in the hands of the heir, second the property of the heir, from whatever source derived to the extent to which he had wasted the assets that had descended to him without satisfying the debts of the deceased. Where property is said to be liable to execution in the hands of heirs as assets inherited from their ancestor, in such a case the question that ordinarily arises is whether the property has so descended or not. That is a question in which the parties interested are the judgment-creditor on one side and the alleged heir himself on the other. The persons interested would be the same if the property against which execution was sought were the property of the heir himself which it was sought to charge on the ground of his having wasted the inherited assets. The provision in the former sect 234 for taking an account made this plain.

An examination of the decisions led to the same result. The cases fell into two classes. The first class consisted of cases in which a person is originally made a party in a representative capacity, or is subsequently made a party in consequence of the death of an original party before decree. In this case it was clearly settled that such a person was a party to the suit within the meaning of sect 244, and that a question between him and the decree holder, as to whether property had come to him as the representative of the judgment debtor, and so was liable to be taken in execution of the decree against him as such representative or on the other hand belonged to himself alone and not in such representative character, was one that must be decided in the execution proceedings, and not by suit. The governing authority on the subject was the decision of the Privy Council in Chowdry Wahed Ali v Jumae, (1) and it was followed and applied in the sense indicated in several subsequent cases in this country (2). The second class of cases consisted of those in which the representatives had not been made parties to the suit before decree, but in which, in consequence of the death of the judgment debtor after decree, a question arose as to the rights of the decree holder to execute the decree against the representatives or the property said to have descended to them. Under Act XXIII of 1861 it was held, both by the Madras (3) and Calcutta (4) High Courts, that representatives proceeded against in execution of a decree against the person they represented were parties to the suit within the meaning of the section corresponding to sect 244 of the last Code. That question no longer arose under the Code of 1882, because in sect 244 of that Code the representatives were expressly mentioned. In both of these cases and in a series of subsequent cases it was held in accordance with the analogy of the other class of decisions already mentioned that questions arising between a decree holder and the representatives of the judgment debtor as to whether property had come to the representatives as such, and so was liable to be taken in execution, or was their own property derived from any other source, and therefore not so liable must be decided in the execution proceeding and not by suit (5). There were other cases in which the decisions turned upon considerations which did not apply to the case mentioned. They were cases in which it was held that a claim either by the judgment debtor or by his representatives to property attached in execution, made not in his own right but as a trustee,⁽¹⁾ did not fall within sect 211 of the last Code (2)

Two propositions were then established under the previous case law firstly, that where in execution of a decree for a debt due by a deceased person, property in the hands of his representative was attached, a claim by the representative to have the property released on the ground that it was his own private property fell not within sect 278 of the last Code but within the section corresponding to this (3). Secondly, however, if the judgment-debtor objected to attachment, not on the ground that the property was his private property but set up a justitia, namely, the right of third parties not before the Court as parties to the suit or their representatives, then the matter fell within sect 278 of the last Code and not this section (4). Thus where the judgment debtor alleged that he was in possession only as shebait of a deity to whom the property had been dedicated, it was held that the case fell within sect 278 read with sect 280 of the last Code, and not within sect 211 of that Code, now represented by this section (5).

Questions arising between whom—Questions may possibly arise between a party on one side and a party on the other side, or between a party on one side and the representative (i.e. heir, executor, administrator or transferee within the meaning of the term hereafter stated) of a party on the other side, or between representatives on both sides, or between a party or his representative on one side and the auction purchaser or his representative on the other. It has been held that the section does not cover a question between a party to a suit and his representative (1).

Parties—This means parties to the suit and on the record (2). It means parties who have properly been made parties in accordance with the provisions of the Code. Thus where a Mahomedan infant was represented by his father's brother (who has disqualified because his interest was adverse) it was held that the minor had never been a party (3). Where a decree is passed against one who represents others, all persons whom he represents are parties, as in the case of Larnavan and members of the tarwad (4). If the question arises between parties the suit (5). A

It was held that she was a party and entitled to appeal (7). Defendants not joining in compromise on which decree was passed were held not to be judgment debtors (8). It was held that where a decree or purchase was made benami sect 244 did not apply, it being said that it was not necessary to apply that section on the footing that the persons really interested were parties (9). But this case, in so far as any rate as it held that the matter did not come within the section as far as the auction purchaser was concerned, must be taken to have been overruled by the Privy Council (10). It was held that the Collector, and, in proceedings relating to the enforcement of an order under sect 412 of the said Code against a next friend, the latter, was not a party (1) If the rights of parties are transferred before decree, and if the transferee is made a party to the suit before decree, then he comes within the words "parties to the suit" (2) A person who is sued in one suit in his personal capacity is in law a different person when suing in a subsequent suit in the capacity of shebait or trustee (3) In a recent case it was held that where a judgment debtor claimed property not in his personal capacity but as a mutwalli who was not a party to the suit, the case did not come under this section (4)

The words "parties to the suit" are not now limited to judgment creditors and judgment debtors (5) The case of rival decree holders has been held not to be within the section, (6) nor a third party objecting to the sale of attached property, (7) nor is a person who becomes a surety for the appearance of a party himself a party to the suit (8) In an order made under an application under O XXXIII r 12 for payment under O XXXIII r 10 or 11, Government is deemed to be a party to the suit, and such an order is therefore under this section and appealable (9)

The Official Assignee is the representative of an insolvent debtor within the meaning of this section. (10) A Court has no jurisdiction in execution to reopen the question as to whether certain persons brought on the record as representatives of the deceased plaintiff, and as such made respondents in an appeal, had been properly joined as parties to the suit (11)

"Representative"—This refers to all persons by or against whom the decree may be executed (see as to this notes to sect 36, ante) The term used is not "legal representative" but "representative" The former term means an heir, devisee, executor, or administrator of a party, or more strictly the last two persons only (1) But a person it was held might be representative within the meaning of this section who is not a legal representative in the sense stated (2) The Courts in India did not confine the term to its primary meaning of executor or administrator, but have included heirs, executors before probate, persons in possession of property of the deceased (3) and persons taking joint property by survivorship (4) A further extension was given to the term so as to include representatives in interest, such as assignees from a mortgagor of mortgaged property in proceedings for the execution of a decree against the mortgagor for sale of the mortgaged property (5) It was held in an early case (6) under the Code of 1882 that the word "representative" meant only persons who succeeded to the rights of any of the parties to the suit after the decree was passed In this case it was held that Run Bahadur was (a) not a legal representative as he inherited not from Ranee Asmedh Koei but from her husband, (7) (b) that he was not a representative under sect 244 because the transfer to him was not after decree, (c) that he was not a party as the suit was dismissed as against him This latter ground would not now be sustainable by reason of the Explanation As regards the second ground, it is to be observed that the Ekranama referred to was not merely before decree but before the suit It is, however, incorrect now to say that only those who take the interests of parties after decree are representatives A person who is a transferee within the meaning of the cases cited is equally such whether the transfer took place pending the suit before decree or after decree (8) There is no distinction between the position of legal representatives added to the suit before and those added after decree (9) A person attaching decree is representative of decree-holder (10)

For the purposes of this section, the word "representative" when used in relation to a party includes the transferee of any interest who so far

not to be a representative of the judgment debtor (1) Where property was purchased subject to an attachment, but the decree under which the attachment was levied was subsequently set aside, it was held that the purchaser was not the representative of the judgment debtor within the meaning of sect 244 of the last Code (2) A person who has purchased a putni holding at a sale in execution of a money-decree, but has not had his name registered in the landlord's register, is bound by a subsequent decree for arrears of rent obtained by the landlord against the registered putnidar and by the sale in execution of that decree, and is therefore a "representative" within the meaning of the section, (3) as is also a person to whom a transferable occupancy holding was mortgaged before its sale in execution of a rent decree, (4) as is also (where the landlord of an occupancy-holding obtains a decree for rent against his recorded tenant) an unregistered transferee of the tenant into whose hands a portion of the holding had previously passed (5) and a mortgagee from the judgment debtor after attachment (6)

Auction-purchaser—A distinction must be kept between the case of an auction-purchaser who, purchasing property affected by the decree, such as the purchase of the equity of the redemption in a mortgage suit, is a representative of the party whose interest is so purchased, within the meaning of the cases cited in the last paragraph and other cases, such as the auction purchaser in execution of a simple money decree The position of the latter was the subject of some conflict of opinion under the preceding Code It was in some cases held that such an auction purchaser was not a party nor the representative of a party to the suit (7) On the other hand it was held that when a question arose within this section the fact that the purchaser who was no party to the suit was interested in the result was no bar to the application of the section (1). This decision of the Privy Council was sometimes understood as laying down that the auction purchaser was a party or a representative. But this was not so, all that was held was that his interest in the result did not prevent the question being one between the parties (2). It was also held that the provisions of sect. 244 prohibited a suit by a party or his representative against an auction purchaser the object of which was to determine a question which properly arose between the parties or their representatives relating to the execution of the decree (3).

An auction purchaser therefore (other than one coming within the meaning of the cases cited in the last paragraph) is not a party or a representative of a party.

The purchaser of an undivided share must sue for partition by separate suit (1). An unrecorded co sharer in a tenancy is not a representative in interest of the recorded tenant within the meaning of this section (5).

Sub section (2)—This is a very just provision intended to remedy mere technical defects. Where a suit is instituted in the same Court as has jurisdiction to execute the decree, the fact that the question has been made the subject of a separate suit in that Court instead of being determined by an order under this section is not a matter affecting jurisdiction but of procedure only (6) and an objection on this account has been held not to be ground of appeal (7). The

In Anandi : Ajudhia, 30 A. 379 (1908) it was held that an auction purchaser is the representative of the judgment debtor, not of the decree holder (see Bhagwati v Banwari 31 A 82 (1908)). In Mahadeo : Darsan, 51 C W N 542 (1911) it was held that an auction purchaser who sets up an antagonistic title is not a representative of the judgment debtor.

Court has therefore considered and treated a plaint under the circumstances stated as an application in execution (1) The Legislature has now sanctioned this practice both as regards suits which should have been applications, as also in the converse case

Where an appeal was erroneously presented to the High Court as a first appeal from an order it refused to convert it into a first appeal from a decree under this section in the old Code read with sect 2 of that Code (2) Where a suit was barred under the provisions of this section but the order of the Court executing the decree was erroneous, the High Court suggested that the latter Court should review its order (3)

Sub section (3).—This sub section corresponds, with amendments, with the last clause of sect 244 of the Code of 1882, which was added to that Code by Act VII of 1888 The Court executing a decree can go into the disputed question of the transfer of the decree (4) Indeed, the question whether a person is a representative must be decided under this section and not by separate suit (5) The sub section refers to a case where there is a dispute between two or more persons as to which of these is the representative of a person who had been a party to the suit It does not include a case in which there could be no representative as there was no party to be represented (6) Nor can an application by the assignee of an auction purchaser to be placed on the record be dealt with under this section, as the expression "representative" does not mean the representative of a party to the execution proceedings, but of a party to the suit (7) It was held by the Madras High Court that the amendment noted did not take away the right of suit at the instance of an assignee of a decree for a declaration as to the validity of his assignment, it being said to be unreasonable to construe the phrase "and not by a separate suit" as applicable to the question referred to in the amendment (8) The sub section has been amended so as to make it compulsory on the Court to determine the question of representation See ante, "History and scope of section"

An appeal lies even in a case in which the question is not between the parties to the suit or their representatives, but only between the decree holder and a person claiming as his assignee (1). The effect of this sub section is to give the right of appeal against an order determining whether a party applying for execution is or is not the representative of the decree holder (2).

A Judge who stayed execution proceedings, pending a suit in which an issue had been raised as to the validity of a will under which the applicant for execution claimed, was held entitled to act upon his determination of that issue in the execution proceedings (3).

The Code contains no provisions under which a representative of a deceased decree holder can have his name entered on the record when nothing remains to be done under the decree beyond its execution, nor is there any necessity for any such entry, as proceedings in execution do not abate on the judgment creditor's death, and his representatives are entitled to continue them (4).

Explanation.—This Explanation has been added to remove a conflict of decisions under the last Code. It was held by the Calcutta (5) and Allahabad (6) High Courts that persons who were exempted from the operation of a decree, by the dismissal, as respects them, of the suit, were thenceforth strangers and not parties to the suit and therefore no longer subject to the section. It was considered that as between the party exonerated and the decree holder, no question relating to execution could arise, because as against him there was no decree to be executed. The Madras (7) and Bombay (8) High Courts, however, held on the contrary that a person was a party to an action, although he might have ceased to have any connection with the suit before the decree was passed and would still come under that clause. The Legislature by this Explanation has now adopted the latter view.

Appeal—The object of the section being that the Court having the parties (and other persons interested) before it, should decide all questions relating to execution arising between them, in place of allowing one or the other of them to put his adversary to the delay and cost of a separate suit in cases in which, but for this section, it might be possible for him to do so, in order to effect this object completely, without injustice to the parties, an order under this section has been included within the definition of decree in sect 2 of the Code (1)

In order to determine whether an appeal lies, it must be first ascertained whether the case is one which falls within the section. In the first place, the order complained of must be one made by a Court executing a decree (2). If so, the question determined by it must be one relating to execution. If it is not, then, unless an appeal is elsewhere expressly given, there is none (3). In the first place, there is a distinction between acts done in pursuance of a decree and acts done in execution of it. So an order passed in a suit for partition subsequent to the decree appointing a commission to make the partition is not an order in execution (4).

There is no appeal from an order not relating to the enforcement of a decree, such as an order of a Judge confirming the report of the commissioner for taking accounts refusing to require the defendants to give inspection of certain books for such an order is not within the contemplation of the section (5). Nor is an order appealable which is a mere ministerial act such as a direction to a subordinate officer to receive money, there being no question in controversy finally determined (6). There is no appeal if the matter is one indirectly and remotely relating to the execution of the decree (7). But though the property may not be the subject of the decree, if it has been interfered with in execution the matter relates to execution (8). Where an order absolute for sale or foreclosure of mortgaged property has been made, any question that arises as to that order has been held not to relate to execution of the decree (9). Nor is there an appeal against an order made when no question arises in execution of decree, the decree having been already executed (1) A question whether the decree itself is invalid is not one relating to execution (2) Further, the question must be between parties or representatives, (3) and not between a party and his representative (4) or between co decree-holders (5) See notes on the terms "Parties," "Representatives" and "Auction-Purchaser," ante Again, assuming that the matter is one mentioned in the section, the order must fall within the definition of a decree It must be an adjudication of the right claimed, and the determination must be final (6) It is not every order made in execution which is a decree, otherwise every interlocutory order in an execution-proceeding, such as an order granting or refusing process for the examination of witnesses, would be appealable (7) So an order merely determining a point of law arising incidentally or otherwise in the course of a proceeding and not refusing or granting relief, is not appealable, (8) nor is an order on an application to set aside a sale under O XXI r 9, (9) nor is an order for security in stay of execution, for it does not determine the rights of the parties (10) Nor is there an appeal when it is otherwise excluded, as in

(a) to preclude the Court from ordering the execution of a decree upon an application presented after the expiration of the said term of twelve years, where the judgment-debtor has, by fraud or force, prevented the execution of the decree at some time within twelve years immediately before the date of the application; or

(b) to limit or otherwise affect the operation of article 180 of the second schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, 1877 (1)

“Where an application to execute a decree.”—This was held to mean an application to execute a decree, and was not confined to the last application preceding the expiry of 12 years from either of the points of time mentioned (2) The former section referred only to decrees for the payment of money (3) or delivery of other property. A decree for the sale of mortgaged property was held not to be a decree for the payment of money, even though the judgment-debtor was personally liable for the deficiency (4) The application of the provision has apparently been extended to all decrees with the exception stated

The words ‘and granted’ have been omitted. ‘Granted’ has been held to mean ‘admitted’ (5) as stated in O XXI r 17, and in addition there has been issue of process in execution (6). ‘Any fresh application’ has been substituted for ‘subsequent application,’ (7) with a view to rendering it clearer that ancillary applications merely to complete arrested execution are not obnoxious to the bar (8). It has been held that since the right to enforce a received by him or taken into his disposition (1) When an application is made under this section the Court should, under O. XXI r 21, issue notice on the person named calling upon him to show cause why the decree should not be executed against him as such representative. If he denies that he is so, the Court which passes a decree decides whether the person against whom execution is sought is the legal representative, though it is for the Court executing the decree to decide to what extent such person is liable (2) The decree holder should show that property of the deceased has come into the possession of his representative, and it is then on the latter to show that he has properly applied the property (3) The heirs are liable in respect of assets even though it may be pleaded that the debtor was a benamidar (4) The right of the decree holder to have his debt paid out of the assets of the deceased in the hands of the legal representative is not affected by the provisions of sect 104 of the Probate and Administration Act (5)

Legal representative—The last Code did not contain any definition of the term "legal representative" The framers of the former section in using this term must either have understood it in some defined sense, or have intended thereby merely to refer to such persons as, under the law applicable to the particular case, might be held to be the legal representatives of a deceased person The first supposition was negatived by the fact that the Legislature omitted to declare what were the characteristics of a legal representative for the purposes of this section (6) It might have been said that such a definition was unnecessary, as the term has a well known technical meaning In their strictest and most ordinary sense the words "legal representatives" are understood to mean executors and administrators only (7)

Though the decisions upon the construction of wills which hold it to be a flexible term and have given it another sense, such as next of kin or descendants, do not control its legal meaning in that they proceed upon the principle that if the Court finds that a testator attached to particular words a different meaning from that which is their proper legal sense, the Court is bound so to construe and give effect to the will, not in its strict legal sense, but in the way in which the testator himself used the words (8) the term is yet one which is naturally capable of a more extended sense than that in which it is ordinarily and strictly employed Had the Legislature, therefore, intended to confine it to particular persons only, viz, executors or administrators, it would have expressly named these persons and would not have used a term which, though in its most strict sense denoting executor or administrator only, is yet capable of a wider meaning. Where there is an executor or administrator, they alone are the legal representatives of a deceased judgment debtor (1). But the section is also commonly applied, both in the case of heirs (2) as well as in that of executors and administrators, and the term "legal representative" has been defined to ordinarily mean all these classes of persons (3).

When there is no executor or administrator, but succession by heirship as in cases governed by the Bengal School of Hindu Law, or in cases of separate and self acquired property under Mitakshara Law, the decree must be executed against the heir as the legal representative within the meaning of this section (4). The section has, however, been applied to cases where the succession is otherwise than by heirship to the last holder of an estate, as also to cases where the estate accrues to the present holder by survivorship (5). In these cases where a decree is passed against a judgment-debtor not in his or her personal capacity, but in a representative capacity, the decree may be executed against the person who, though not an heir of the judgment debtor, the last holder of the estate, is entitled thereto after his or her death whether as reversioner or surviving co-parcener (6). So inasmuch as a decree properly obtained against a Hindu widow in her representative capacity is binding upon her husband's reversioner, (7) where a suit has been instituted or defended by a Hindu widow in her representative capacity, the reversioners though they do not claim through her but as heirs of her husband, have yet been held to be her legal representatives in respect of the estate held by her as such Hindu widow (8). Again in the case of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara,

The section has however been applied to cases where the succession is otherwise than by heirship to the last holder of an estate, as also to cases where the estate accrues to the present holder by survivorship (5). In these cases where a decree is passed against a judgment debtor not in his or her personal capacity, but in a representative capacity the decree may be executed against the person who, though not an heir of the judgment debtor the last holder of the estate, is entitled thereto after his or her death whether as reversioner or surviving co-parcener (6). So inasmuch as a decree properly obtained against a Hindu widow in her representative capacity is binding upon her husband's reversioner (7) where a suit has been instituted or defended by a Hindu widow in her representative capacity, the reversioners though they do not claim through her but as heirs of her husband have yet been held to be her legal representatives in respect of the estate held by her as such Hindu widow (8). Again in the case of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara

though it has been held by the Madras and Allahabad and formerly by the Calcutta, (1) High Courts, that in the case of a personal decree for money obtained against the father the interest of the latter in the joint ancestral properties is not assets in the hand of the son when he dies and consequently, notwithstanding his obligation to pay his father's debt proceedings cannot be taken against him under this section as the legal representative of his father the contrary view has been adopted by the Bombay High Court in that the obligation of a son to satisfy his father's debt is within the scope of the decree against the father whether on the ground of representation of the sons by their father, (2) or on the ground that the creditor has the power to attach and sell the entire interest in the property in execution proceedings against the father, (3) and the Calcutta High Court has recently held that the liability may be determined in the execution proceedings if the legal representative has been properly brought on the record under this section (4) This question is now settled by sect 53 post Where moreover the interest of the father has been attached during his lifetime (5) or a decree directing a sale of hypothecated property has been passed in the lifetime of the judgment debtor, (6) or the judgment debtor has been expressly sued as representing the undivided family, (7) or the decree charges the family property, (8) in all these cases the decree, it has been held, may be executed against those who in succession, in time, take by the legal title of survivorship and not by that of heirship

The principle under consideration has been still further extended to the case of a person who without title as administrator, executor, heir reversioner or surviving co parcener is the de facto possessor of the estate of a deceased Hindu it having been held that he must be treated for some purposes as his representative and that a judgment obtained against such a representative is not a mere nullity (9) The first of these cases proceeds upon the assumption that under the law as it existed prior to 1881 the executor did not represent the deceased until he had obtained probate, and the hardship in the particular case which led the Court to take the view it did, no longer exists. The Madras High Court has more recently held that there is no authority for holding that the words "legal representative" include any person who has taken possession of the property of a deceased judgment debtor, and that a stranger in possession of property who was not a party to the decree ought not to be proceeded against in execution or otherwise than by a regular suit, and that the words "legal representative" cannot be taken to include any person who does not in law represent the estate of the deceased (1). And though in the two former cases the question arose with reference to a suit brought by the creditor against the representative, and not with reference to proceedings taken in execution of a decree, the Calcutta High Court has expressed an opinion that the principle underlying the observations in these cases are equally applicable to proceedings in execution as to proceedings by regular suit (2).

From this review of the authorities it will appear that judicial decisions prior to this Code extended the sense of the term "legal representative" beyond that of its ordinary meaning of "administrator, executor and heir" and though such extension has been attended with doubt and has in some cases been the subject of conflicting decisions, it was too late to endeavour however convenient it might have been to secure for the term that which is perhaps its strict and legitimate sense. The term was therefore not limited to administrators, executors and heirs, and must have been held to include any person who in law represented the estate of a deceased judgment-debtor (3). And the term has now been so defined in sect. 2, clause (11).

A decree passed against the Valiya Rajah of a Kovilagam is prima facie binding on his successor and his Kovilagam (4). The successor to an unsettled polliem is not liable for the debts of the person whose heir he is as respects that polliem. The polliem reverts absolutely to the Government and by the fresh grant to the successor a newly created estate for life becomes vested in him (5). In the undermentioned case an impartible Raj in the possession of the respondent was held not to be assets of the deceased nor was he the legal representative of the deceased (6) and a decree against a limited company was held unenforceable against another company (7). A decree containing an injunction can be enforced against a legal representative under this section (8).

Execution has been allowed under this section against the legal representative of the legal representative (1)

There may be an estoppel. Thus, though ordinarily a Court has no power to put a debtor's vendee on the record (2) where a person filed a petition in a suit, saying that all the property of the judgment debtor had passed to him and for several years opposed execution, it was held that though his name was not on the record he had yet made himself liable as a defendant (3). The legal representative binds all property in his possession and where an adult legal representative was in possession a sale was held good and not affected by the non appointment of a guardian ad litem (4).

The Code of 1859 gave power to execute a decree against the estate of a deceased judgment debtor. A proposal to revive this provision having been excepted to the criticisms were met by a further proposal to give a remedy against the person in possession of the estate. As already stated in the last paragraph it was formerly a question whether the term legal representative in sect 239 of the last Code included a stranger who, not being a party to the decree was in possession of the property of the deceased. It was held (5) under the Code of 1859 and this appears to be law now, that if no other legal representative can be found, the decree-holder may then proceed against persons in possession of the estate belonging to the deceased. The definition in sect 2 clause (11) includes a person intermeddling with the estate.

It was proposed to enact that the death of a judgment debtor before the decree had been fully executed should not be deemed to affect the validity as against such legal representative of any proceeding lawfully taken during his lifetime. Where property has actually been sold by order of the Court executing the decree probably no difficulty arises. This clause was however, thought at one time to be necessary to meet the case of a judgment debtor dying before the sale is effected (6). It has not, however been introduced.

PROCEDURE IN EXECUTION

51 Subject to such conditions and limitations as may be

Powers of Court to enforce execution prescribed the Court may, on the application of the decree holder, order execution of the decree—

- (a) by delivery of any property specifically decreed,
- (b) by attachment and sale or by sale without attachment of any property,
- (c) by arrest and detention in prison of any person,
- (d) by appointing a receiver, or
- (e) in such other manner as the nature of the relief granted may require

Sects 51-54 deal with procedure in execution generally; 55-59 with arrest; 60-64 with attachment, 65-67 with sale, and various rules in the Order mentioned deal with the same subjects. 52. (1) Where a decree is passed against a party as the legal representative of a deceased person, and the decree is for the payment of money out of the property of the deceased, it may be executed by the attachment and sale of any such property. [s 2]

(2) Where no such property remains in the possession of the judgment-debtor and he fails to satisfy the Court that he has duly applied such property of the deceased as is proved to have come into his possession, the decree may be executed against the judgment debtor to the extent of the property in respect of which he has failed so to satisfy the Court in the same manner as if the decree had been against him personally.

Decrees against legal representatives—This section corresponds with sect 203 of Act VIII of 1859 save for some slight verbal alterations and the substitution of the words "remains in the possession of the judgment debtor and he" by s 252, Act XIV of 1882, for the words "can be found and the judgment debtor" of the Code of 1859, and the words "in respect of which he has failed so to satisfy the Court" by the present Code for the words "not duly applied by him" previously appearing. The Code of 1859 also had a section (211) providing the same procedure where the decree was ordered to be executed against the legal representative

"Where a decree is passed"—A decree passed against a person already dead, cannot however, be executed against his legal representatives (1)

"Legal representative of the deceased"—This includes persons who have been legal representatives in execution proceedings, (2) and the heir of an intestate (3). A person taking possession of the estate of a deceased Hindu leaving a will may be treated as the legal representative until Probate is taken, (4)

Where a Hindu widow is sued as such and as guardian of her son and a decree obtained against her as her husband's representative, the sale in execution of property includes the son's interest therein, (1) as also where the son was an adopted son, (2) but where the widow in the plaint was described as the widow of A deceased and the mother of D and B minors, and the decree (on a bond due by her husband) was against her personally it was held the sale of the minor's property was invalid (3) So also where a Hindu defendant died leaving a widow and a minor son and the suit was continued against the widow not as guardian of her son, and after the widow's death, against the sister of the deceased though not appointed guardian ad litem of the minor or administrator of his estate, the minor son was not bound (4) So where a widow borrowed not as administrator and without pledging any specific property of the estate, it was held to be her personal debt, (5) that is so where the debt is for rent, (6) but not where it was for necessary repairs (7) Where, however, the mother of the deceased obtained a personal decree against his widow for maintenance payable after his death, only the widow's interest in the estate of the deceased could be sold in execution (8) The test as to whether a decree against a Hindu widow binds the reversioners is whether the cause of action was one personal to her or one affecting the estate of the reversioner, (9) and the question must be decided from the decree and the execution record (10)

As to Mahomedans, a decree against one of the heirs cannot bind the other heirs, (11) and a decree by consent against some of the heirs for a debt due by the deceased only binds those who are parties (12) [This is not so in the case of Hindus (13)] A sale under a decree against a Mahomedan daughter, who though sued as representative, did not represent the whole estate, there being a widow and another daughter, carried only the share of the judgment debtor, (14) so also a Mahomedan daughter is not bound by a decree made against the widow of her father in respect of his debts or by a subsequent sale by the widows to the judgment creditor but could only recover her share of the property on payment of her share of her father's debts, (15) Mahomedan heirs who are not parties to a suit not being bound by a sale in execution but cannot recover their shares without paying their share of the debts, (1) as the purchaser does not acquire the whole estate but acquires it subject to all legal and equitable rights of inheritance (2) Thus in a mortgage sale the heirs of the mortgagor who were not parties to the suit were given an opportunity to redeem (3) The Bombay High Court, however, held that a daughter though not a party was bound by the sale (4) When, however, an heir in possession is sued and a decree made against the assets of the deceased the decree binds the other heirs (5)

"Decree is for the payment of money"—A decree for accounts within a specified period which the defendant survived without proceedings being taken against him cannot, after his death, be executed against his widow and representative (6)

"Out of the property of the deceased"—The legal representative can set up an answer that the property in her possession is her own and does not belong to the deceased's estate (7) A decree obtained against the remainderman, a brother of the deceased, will not enable the creditor to touch the estate in the hands of the widow, (8) but in execution of a decree against a joint family property bought by a member of the family with joint funds may be taken in execution (9) The Court in execution proceedings will look at the substance of the transaction (10) See also sect 53

"May be executed"—The legal representative is not entitled in the execution stage to reopen the whole case and to inquire into the nature of the debt, (11) but can bring a suit (12) Sect 282 of the Indian Succession Act, where applicable, does not prevent a decree holder having the whole of his decree satisfied out of the assets of the deceased so far as they go to the exclusion of other creditors whose claims are admitted but who have not obtained decrees (13) Where successive applications have been made for years against a party merely as representative of a deceased defendant, execution cannot be taken out against him personally as one of the original defendants, even if he were liable in both capacities (14)

"Any such property"—Under a decree on a bond against the widow of the deceased obligor, a Hindu, the property of the debtor, described as the property of the widow, was sold, and it was held that the sale was good against the son and heir of the deceased, (1) so, where property is described at the time of the execution sale as the property of the judgment debtors, who were sued as mere representatives of the deceased judgment debtor, prima facie what is sold is the property of the deceased debtor, and even if the decree is in terms as if it were a personal decree yet it must be construed as if it was for the debt of the deceased (2) But in a case where in the judgment, though not in the decree, the widow (who was only entitled to maintenance) was described as the representative of her deceased husband, the suit being for the husband's debt, the sale of her interest did not affect the deceased's estate (3) To ascertain what was sold under the right title and interest of the widow the Court is at liberty to look at the judgment. If the judgment bound the reversionary heir, the purchaser took the estate absolutely (4) Under a decree against a widow as representative of her deceased husband, a member of a joint Mitakshara family, property of the deceased passing by survivorship to the other members, cannot be sold (5) This confines the procedure to property remaining in the possession of the legal representative leaving the creditor to follow property improperly aliened by the legal representative by a separate suit (6) The onus of proving the legal necessity of a sale by a Hindu widow is on the purchaser, and recitals in mortgages or sale deeds are not sufficient evidence (7) A Hindu widow can with the consent of the next reversioner transfer her inherited estate inter vivos, (8) though not by bequest (9)

"If no such property remains"—The decree holder must satisfy the Court as to this before the Court will proceed under the second clause of this section (10) If the legal representative has sold such property to a third party the former is personally liable for the debt to the extent of the assets he has received (11)

"Has duly applied"—This should be proved by filing and proving an inventory (12) and unless he proves that he has duly applied his property is liable, (13) whether the debt became due before or after the death of the debtor (14) He has only to account up to the full value of the assets he received is legal representative, and if he has properly done so, the decree can no longer be executed even though he may still hold property which originally belonged to the deceased judgment debtor. If the decree be against him as representative, it is a legal and reasonable presumption, until the contrary is proved, that payments made by him were as representative done (1).

"Such property of the deceased"—The question whether the entire estate in a zemindary (and not merely the zemindar's life interest) was sold in execution and bought by a purchaser is a question of mixed law and fact to be determined according to the circumstances of each case, (2) and the state of the law is understood at the time of the sale is to be considered in such determination (3). Ghatwals lands in Birbhoom are not liable to be seized in the hands of the son in execution of a decree against the deceased father, (4) the surplus proceeds of such tenure collected during the lifetime of the judgment-debtor are liable (5) but not those accrued after his death (6). A shikmi ghatwali tenure is not liable, (7) but ghatwali tenures in Kharukpore are (8).

"Proved to have come into his possession"—The onus is on the decree holder to do this, (9) he has to show that some assets came to the legal representative, and the onus is then shifted to the latter to prove how much came and how it has been applied (10). The legal representative may admit receipt of assets by implication, e.g. by asking time to pay the amount of the decree (11).

"In the same manner"—This may be by detention in the civil jail (12).

Appeal—Under sect 11 of Act XXII of 1861 an appeal lay from orders passed against a representative under sect 203 of Act VIII of 1859, corresponding with the first clause of the present section (13). See now sects 104 and 47.

revenue paying estates (1) Later, however, it was held that partition of lands in a revenue paying estate could only be made by a Collector (2) This, however, was overruled by a Full Bench decision holding that a Civil Court could partition revenue paying estates save when the partition sought a separate allotment of revenue (3) Under sect. 107 of the U. I. Land Revenue Act, the partition cannot be made by the Collector until the decree-holder's name is recorded in the revenue papers (4) Where a person was entitled in pursuance of an order to be put into possession of a particular village, and in execution of this order the Collector put him in possession, under this section, of a wrong village, it was held that the order of the Collector was a mere nullity, and that such person was entitled to sue for possession of the village he was rightfully entitled to (5)

ARREST AND DETENTION.

36] 55. (1) A judgment-debtor may be arrested in execution of a decree at any hour and on any day, and shall, as soon as practicable, be brought before the Court, and his detention may be in the civil prison of the district in which the Court ordering the detention is situate, or, where such civil prison does not afford suitable accommodation, in any other place which the Local Government may appoint for the detention of persons ordered by the Courts of such district to be detained :

Arrest and detention

Provided, firstly, that, for the purpose of making an arrest under this section, no dwelling-house shall be entered after sunset and before sunrise :

Provided, secondly, that no outer door of a dwelling-house shall be broken open unless such dwelling-house is in the occupancy of the judgment-debtor and he refuses or in any way prevents access thereto, but when the officer authorized to make the arrest has duly gained access to any dwelling-house, he may break open the door of any room in which he has reason to believe the judgment-debtor to be found :

Provided, thirdly, that, if the room is in the actual occupancy of a woman who is not the judgment-debtor and who according to the customs of the country does not appear in public, the officer authorized to make the arrest, shall give notice to her that she is at liberty to withdraw, and, after allowing a reasonable time for her to withdraw and giving her reasonable facility for withdrawing, may enter the room for the purpose of making the arrest.

Provided, fourthly, that, where the decree in execution of which a judgment-debtor is arrested, is a decree for the payment of money and the judgment-debtor pays the amount of the decree and the costs of the arrest to the officer arresting him, such officer shall at once release him.

(2) The Local Government may, by notification in the local official Gazette, declare that any person or class of persons whose arrest might be attended with danger or inconvenience to the public shall not be liable to arrest in execution of a decree otherwise than in accordance with such procedure as may be prescribed by the Local Government on this behalf.

(3) Where a judgment-debtor is arrested in execution of a decree for the payment of money and brought before the Court, the Court shall inform him that he may apply to be declared an insolvent, and that he will be discharged if he has not committed any act of bad faith regarding the subject of the application and if he complies with the provisions of the law of insolvency for the time being in force

(4) Where a judgment-debtor expresses his intention to apply to be declared an insolvent and furnishes security, to the satisfaction of the Court, that he will within one month so apply, and that he will appear, when called upon, in any proceeding upon the application or upon the decree in execution of which he was arrested, the Court shall release him from arrest, and, if he fails so to apply and to appear, the Court may either direct the security to be realized or commit him to the civil prison in execution of the decree.

Arrest—This section corresponds with sect 336 of Act X of 1877 save that the 2nd and 3rd provisos did not then appear. These provisos as also the words "In the case of a surety, such security may be realized in manner provided by sect 253," were added by sect 336 of Act XIV of 1882. In such Code the words in the first sub clause, "detention" "civil prison" and "detained," were expressed by "imprisonment" "civil jail" or "jail" and "imprisoned" The second proviso then commenced "no outer door of a dwelling house shall be broken open; but" This has now been altered as indicated in italics by the present Code, which substitutes "break" for "unfasten and" The words in italics in the 3rd and 4th proviso and in the 2nd and 4th sub clauses have been added by the present Code, the words "furnishes security to the satisfaction of the Court" being substituted for "furnish sufficient security" The third sub clause in the Codes of 1877 and 1882 was prefaced by "The Local Government may by notification published in the official Gazette, direct that whenever" instead of "Where," and ended with the words "places all his property in possession of a receiver appointed by the Court" instead of the words in italics it also provided that the application to be declared an insolvent was to be "under Chapter XX" See now Provisional Insolvency Act III of 1907 The provision as to the method of realizing the security has been omitted, as it comes within the provisions of sect 115

"A judgment-debtor may be arrested"—A purdanasheen lady was not exempt from arrest (1) but see sect 56, which was introduced into the Code in 1888

"May be arrested"—The officer arresting a judgment debtor must have the warrant of arrest in his possession at the time of making the apprehension, otherwise it is illegal (2) A decree against the hypothecated property and against the defendants personally, and containing no condition for execution first against the property, may be enforced against the person or the property of the judgment debtor, whichever the decree holder thinks best, (3) but a decree merely against mortgaged property and making no personal order for payment, cannot be executed against the person of the judgment debtor (4)

"On any day"—An arrest may be made on Sunday under process of a Mofussil Court (5)

"In any other place"—A list of such places has been notified for Burma (6) and also for Madras (7)

Sub clause (1), second proviso—Under the former Code an outer door could not be broken open It was proposed to enact that if the judgment debtor or any person in whose dwelling house the officer authorized to make the arrest had reason to believe the judgment debtor was to be found, refused access to his house such officer might remove or open any lock or bolt and might break open any outer door The amendments in this proviso were suggested to prevent vexatious forms of resistance to execution which constantly obstruct decree-holders in the execution of their decrees Afterwards, however, the amendment took its present form, the Select Committee stating that they had carefully considered the provisions as to breaking open dwelling houses, and that they had come to the conclusion that it should be limited to dwelling houses in the occupancy of the judgment debtor

"Who is not the judgment debtor"—It was formerly held that no order was necessary to enter a zenana of a purdanasheen judgment debtor (8) but that decision was before sect 56 was included in the Code

Sub clause (2)—This sub clause is intended to cover the cases of certain persons or classes of persons whose summary arrest might, as in the case of railway servants, be attended with danger or inconvenience to the public

Sub clause (3)—Under the Codes of 1877 and 1882 this provision only extended to such provinces as were notified by the Local Governments. Such notifications were published as to Assam, (1) Bengal, (2) Bombay (3) Burma, (4) Central Provinces, (5) Madras, (6) N W P and Oudh (7) and the Punjab, (8) As to the Provincial Insolvency law, see now Act III of 1907, which takes the place of Chapter XX of the former Code

"Apply to be declared"—Under the Codes of 1877 and 1882 this provision ran "apply under Chapter XX to be declared". That Chapter did not apply to the towns of Calcutta, Madras, or Bombay (9). In such Presidency towns the judgment-debtor might have applied under the Act for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors 11 & 12 Vict c 21 (10)

"Expresses his intention to apply"—If he does not, and is committed to jail, he might from jail apply under Chapter XX of the previous Code (but now the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1907), and may be released under its provisions (11). This section only applies to judgment debtors who are under arrest and not already committed to jail. When a debtor is imprisoned he can only be discharged under sect 58 (12). See also O XXI r 10

"Furnishes security"—The surety was under the Code of 1882 discharged on the judgment debtor filing his petition in insolvency, (13) but under the present section apparently the surety would not be discharged until the judgment debtor had "appeared" also (14). A surety is discharged by the death of the judgment debtor before expiration of the time specified in the security bond, (15) or if the proceedings taken in execution of the decree wherein the security was furnished comes to an end or are struck off, (16) or if security is

Arrest of women.—The form was altered in the last Code by sec. 2 Act VI. of 1858.

57. The Local Government may fix such regulations as it may think fit for the purpose of regulating the payment of the expenses of the maintenance of judgment-debtors.

Subsistence allowance.—For the regulations applicable to the execution of Orders of Maintenance of Local Bodies and Orders of 1859, vide sec. 1206 see Bureau of Public Health, vol. 1, p. 115, and for N.W.P. see North Western Provinces and Oudh, List of Local Bodies and Orders of 1859, p. 115. Secs. 583 and 549 are now O. XXI: 32 p. 4.

58. (1) Every person detained in the civil prison in execution of a decree shall be so detained,—

Detention and release. (a) where the decree is for the payment of a sum of money exceeding fifty rupees, for a period of six months, and,

(b) in any other case, for a period of six weeks :
Provided that he shall be released from such detention before the expiration of the said period of six months or six weeks, as the case may be,—

- (i) on the amount mentioned in the warrant for his detention being paid to the officer in charge of the civil prison, or
- (ii) on the decree against him being otherwise fully satisfied, or
- (iii) on the request of the person on whose application he has been so detained, or
- (iv) on the omission by the person, on whose application he has been so detained, to pay subsistence allowance.

Provided, also, that he shall not be released from such detention under clause (ii) or clause (iii), without the order of the Court.

(2) A judgment-debtor released from detention under this section shall not merely by reason of his release be discharged from his debt, but he shall not be liable to be re-arrested under the decree in execution of which he was detained in the civil prison.

Duration of imprisonment.—The first portion of the section down to the Proviso corresponds with sec. 278 of Act VIII. of 1859 and sec. 312 of the last Code, though the form of the section has been remodelled (vide post).

The section after the Proviso corresponds (with verbal alterations) to sect 341 of the last Code omitting clause (f) of that section, which is no longer necessary owing to the remodelled form of the former sect 342. A prisoner once discharged for want of deposit of subsistence-money should not be retaken (1). Where a person is imprisoned under sect 481 (now O XXXVIII r 4), post, imprisonment suffered after decree must be taken into consideration in calculating the six months (2). On the expiration of the period, the prisoner is entitled to his discharge whether the imprisonment has been continuous or only at intervals (3). The imprisonment is not a satisfaction of the decree, and the debtor can be adjudicated an insolvent for it, (4) or his personal property may be taken in execution under the same decree. (5) This section does not empower a Judge to fix a term of imprisonment at his discretion within the maximum. If none of the conditions mentioned in the proviso are fulfilled before the expiry of six months or six weeks as the case may be, the judgment-debtor remains in jail the full time (6). The language of clause (1) has thus been recast to show that this provision does not confer on the Court a discretion to fix shorter periods of imprisonment than those prescribed. This section does not apply to cases of imprisonment for contempt of Court (7).

59 (1) At any time after a warrant for the arrest of a judgment-debtor has been issued the Court may cancel it on the ground of his serious illness.

(2) Where a judgment-debtor has been arrested the Court may release him if in its opinion, he is not in a fit state of health to be detained in the civil prison.

(3) Where a judgment-debtor has been committed to the civil prison he may be released therefrom—

(a) by the Local Government on the ground of the existence of any infectious or contagious disease, or

(b) by the committing Court, or any Court to which that Court is subordinate, on the ground of his suffering from any serious illness.

(4) A judgment-debtor released under this section may be re-arrested, but the period of his detention in the civil prison shall not in the aggregate exceed that prescribed by section 58.

Illness of judgment-debtor—This section corresponds with sect 653 of the last Code. Sect 653 was added to that Code by sect 8 of Act VI of 1888

ATTACHMENT.

60. (1) The following property is liable to attachment and sale in execution of a decree, namely, Property liable to attachment and sale in execution of decree. lands, houses or other buildings, goods, money, banknotes, cheques, bills of exchange, hundis, promissory notes, Government securities, bonds or other securities for money, debts, shares in a corporation and, sale as hereinafter mentioned, all other saleable property, moveable or immoveable, belonging to the judgment debtor, or over which, or the profits of which, he has a disposing power which he may exercise for his own benefit, whether the same be held in the name of the judgment-debtor or by another person in trust for him or on his behalf.

Provided that the following particulars shall not be liable to such attachment or sale, namely —

- (a) the necessary wearing-apparel, cooking vessels beds and bedding of the judgment-debtor, his wife and children, and such personal ornaments as, in accordance with religious usage, cannot be parted with by any woman,
- (b) tools of artizans, and, where the judgment debtor is an agriculturist, his implements of husbandry and such cattle and seed grain as may, in the opinion of the

- (h) allowances (being less than salary) of any public officer or of any servant of a railway company or local authority while absent from duty,
- (i) the salary or allowances equal to salary of any such public officer or servant as is referred to in clause (h), while on duty, to the extent of—
 - (i) the whole of the salary, where the salary does not exceed twenty rupees monthly,
 - (ii) twenty rupees monthly, where the salary exceeds twenty rupees and does not exceed forty rupees monthly, and
 - (iii) one moiety of the salary in any other case,
- (j) the pay and allowances of persons to whom the Indian Articles of War apply,
- (k) all compulsory deposits and other sums in or derived from any fund to which the Provident Funds Act, 1897, for the time being applies in so far as they are declared by the said Act not to be liable to attachment,
- (l) the wages of labourers and domestic servants whether payable in money or in kind,
- (m) an expectancy of succession by survivorship or other merely contingent or possible right or interest,
- (n) a right to future maintenance,
- (o) any allowance declared by any law passed under the Indian Councils Acts 1861 and 1892, to be exempt from liability to attachment or sale in execution of a decree, and,
- (p) where the judgment debtor is a person liable for the payment of land revenue, any moveable property which, under any law for the time being applicable to him is exempt from sale for the recovery of an arrear of such revenue

Explanation—The particulars mentioned in clauses (g), (h), (i), (j), (l) and (o) are exempt from attachment or sale whether before or after they are actually payable

(2) Nothing in this section shall be deemed—

- (a) to exempt houses and other buildings (with the materials and the sites thereof and the lands immediately appurtenant thereto and necessary for their enjoyment) from attachment or sale in execution of decrees for rent of any such house, building, site or land, or
- (b) to affect the provisions of the Army Act or of any similar law for the time being in force

on a verdict until judgment has been signed (1) Money in the hands of a garnishee which he is bound to pay is a debt, (2) so is rent that is due, (3) but claims over which no Court in British India has jurisdiction are not debts liable to be attached, but the mere circumstance that the garnishee is at the time of the application for execution beyond the limits of British India would not of itself render the debt not liable to be attached (4) A gratuity sanctioned by a Railway Company, the money being in the hands of its paymaster, is not a debt, and cannot be attached as the gift is not complete, (5) but a monthly allowance given in payment of an antecedent debt is attachable, and an attachment may be made of half the monthly allowance when 3 weeks have expired, inasmuch as 3 weeks of the allowance had become an existing debt though payable on a future date (6) Money due by an agent or a vendee to his principal or vendor is a debt, and may be attached, and it is not necessary that the exact amount due should be ascertained prior to attachment, (7) but a vendor's right or interest in the balance of purchase money of immoveable property payable on execution of a conveyance is not a debt so long as the conveyance remains unsigned (8) The salary of a private person is not attachable until it becomes due and is an existing debt (9) It was questionable whether arrears of interest due on Government Promissory Notes was attachable (10) A decree can be attached, (11) but a decree for money, though a judgment debt is not liable to sale in execution, and sect 273 of the former Code (corresponding with O XXI r 53 of the present Code) provide the procedure in execution (12)

"Government securities"—Money or other security deposited by the judgment debtor with a Railway Company as security for the performance of his duties is attachable subject to the lien of the Railway Company but not saleable until the deposit is at the disposal of the judgment debtor freed from such lien (13)

"All other saleable property"—As regards partnership property, it was held that it could not be attached and removed from the possession of the partners in execution of a decree against only one of the partners, (14) nor could one partner attach the interest of another partner in the partnership business in the hands of a Receiver,(1) and debts due from one partner to another were not attachable (2) The share of a partner in the partnership in the hands of another partner might be attached, which should be done by prohibitory order,(3) and even the sale in execution of the interest of one partner, in a partnership dissolved by the death of his father and co partner, was good,(4) but where the interest attached and sold was in a subsisting partnership, the purchaser could sue for dissolution and accounts (5) The effect of these decisions have been partially codified in O XXI r 19 The interest of an undivided father, a member of a Mitakshara family, can be attached and sold This is the law in Bengal, Madras, Allahabad and Bombay. But the purchaser merely acquires the right to compel a partition as against the other co sharers of the judgment-debtor (6) The interest of a son,(7) and of any other member of the joint family, is in the same position, (8) even that of a grandson in the lifetime of his father and grandfather (9) And property in the hands of a son or other descendant which is liable under Hindu law for the payment of the debt of a deceased ancestor in respect of which a decree has been passed shall be deemed to be the property of the deceased (10) The equity of redemption in mortgaged property can be attached and sold in execution of a decree against the mortgagor (11) but not if the person applying for attachment and sale is also the mortgagee (12) Mortgaged property may be attached but cannot be sold without a suit by the mortgagee under sect. 67 of the Transfer of Property Act (13) Property is attachable even though it cannot be brought to sale without suit (14) A tenant's hereditary and beneficial interest in property can be attached and sold,(15) but an interest in an occupancy tenure, which is not transferable by custom or usage, is not saleable in execution, save for rent under the Bengal Tenancy Act (16) A judgment-debtor has a saleable interest in land upon which he was permitted to erect a mud house and occupy it for forty years, without any reservation by the landlord that he could be ousted, but for which he paid rent (17) The right to get back from the donee certain lands reserved to the judgment debtor

by a deed of gift is transferable and therefore attachable, (1) so also is a life interest in trust funds in the hands of the Official Trustee, (2) but property in the hands of the Receiver of the High Court cannot be proceeded against by attachment in the Mofussil, but the High Court can order attachment and direct the Receiver to sell the interest of the judgment debtor (3) Property of which the judgment debtor had been in possession for 12 years after he had filed his petition in insolvency was attachable, his title being by adverse possession (4) Property the subject of an existing suit is attachable, but in such a case the Court would order the sale at the fittest and most proper time (5) A decree also is attachable (6) The right to manage a religious trust is not attachable (7) nor the right to officiate at worship or to receive the offerings at a shrine, (8) nor can voluntary offerings which may in future be made to an idol, as being entirely uncertain (9) So also a thing utterly incapable of being estimated or valued, such as "all the claims of Ramnath against all his debtors," cannot be attached (10) The doors and window shutters of a pucca building cannot be separately attached, as they formed part of unmoveable property (11) Trees growing on the sir land of an ex proprietary tenant under sect 7 of Act XII of 1881 (N W P Rent Act) cannot be sold in execution (12) A portion of a bhag cannot be attached under a mortgage decree against that portion, the mortgage of a portion of a bhag being unlawful (13) Future rents and profits of a ghatwahi tenure cannot as such be attached (14)

"Immoveable"—In Oudh no ancestral property can be sold in execution without permission of the Chief Commissioner, and no self acquired property without permission of the Commissioner (15)

"The profits of which"—Attachment of property includes attachment of the profits thereof but if after attachment the original owner be allowed to remain in possession of the property, the profits from the moment they found their way into the owner's pocket cease to be liable for the judgment debtor (16)

"A disposing power"—A letter containing notes in the Post Office can be attached as in the disposing power of the addressee, (17) but not money

payable to an auctioneer by purchasers of goods entrusted to him for auction, except as to such amount as the judgment debtor had a disposing power exercisable for his own benefit (1) When the judgment debtor contracted to lay down a pavement for B and deposited materials for the work and received an advance from B equal to the value, the materials vested in B and could not be attached (2) The corpus of trust property in the hands of a trustee cannot be attached, (3) nor an insolvent's property vested in the Official Assignee, (4) nor land assigned to a widow by way of maintenance with a proviso against alienation; (5) nor land assigned in lieu of maintenance without any mention of such proviso, as coming under clause (n) of this section; (6) but land let under a lease prohibiting the lessee assigning the property either by sale or gift is attachable, (7) so is a donee's share in property given with a proviso that it should be held impartible (8) Joint family property is attachable in execution of a decree against the father, so as to affect the interests of his sons, unless the sons can show that their shares were not answerable for the decree (9) In Madras, the attachment of the interest of an undivided member in a joint property in execution of a decree on a personal debt against him, constitutes a valid charge in favour of the judgment creditor and prevents the accrual to the other coparceners of the right of survivorship on the death of the judgment debtor pending attachment (10) The income of property subject to a restraint upon anticipation accruing due after the date of the judgment cannot be attached in execution of a decree against the separate property of a married woman (11)

"Necessary wearing-apparel."—This was the effect of a Bombay High Court decision in 1872 (12) A mangalsutra or necklace worn by a married woman during the lifetime of her husband and never removed is exempt (13) (and see now amendment), so are the clothes, equipment and arms of a person subject to the Indian Marine Act, (14) so is the stridhan property of a Hindu wife when execution is sought of a decree against her husband (15) Property in zananas is not exempt from attachment (16) not a pension and is attachable, (1) similarly the grant of an annual sum made by Government as compensation for loss sustained by the grantee on account of improper resumption by Government of rent free lands (2) In England, superannuation allowance already accrued due to a retired police constable is attachable, (3) and pensions solely in respect of past services are liable to sequestration, though half pay, being to some extent for future services, is not (4) A zemindari granted (not revenue free) by Government as a reward for services rendered is not a pension (5) Pensions were exempted by Act XXIII of 1871 In clause (g) the words "military or civil" have been omitted as being of no value The word "pensioners" of itself covers every class of pensioner

"Salary of any public officer"—Under sect 236 of Act VIII of 1859, salaries of Railway servants had to be actually due before they could be attached, (6) similarly the salary of a Telegraph Officer, (7) but now the unprivileged portion can be attached in advance (8) The Calcutta High Court has held that while the pay of an Indian Staff Corps officer, as being of a public officer, comes within the meaning of this section, that of an officer of the Regular Forces, not being of a public officer, does not, (9) and the Allahabad High Court has also held that an officer of the Regular forces is not a public officer and that his pay cannot be attached, (10) but in Madras it has been held that he is a public officer and his pay is attachable (11) Half the pay of persons subject to military law other than soldiers of the regular forces is liable to attachment (12) An attachment upon the salary of a Railway servant ceases to be operative after he has filed his petition in Insolvency, and should be withdrawn on notice being received of the making of the vesting order (13) For definition of "public officer" see sect 2 (17) Under the Code of 1859, the whole of the salary of a peon in the service of a Mamlatdar under Government could be attached, if it had become due (14) The remuneration of a Watandar cannot be attached while in the hands of the Collector or other disbursing officer, but otherwise if in the hands of the watandar himself (15) A lhot is not a public officer and the percentage on collections received by him is not salary and is attachable (16) The salary of a private person cannot be attached until it becomes due and a debt exists (1) Formerly it was held that money given by Government to its servants, not only for past services but also as a retainer for future services, cannot be attached, and that the pay of a Government official was not attachable (2)

"One moiety of the salary."—That under the Code of 1882 was half the salary or leave allowance actually payable (3) but under the present Code it refers only to salary or allowance equal to salary while on duty. In a recent case it has been held that a salary is "property" of an insolvent within the meaning of the Provincial Insolvency Act (sect 16, sub-sect 2, clause a), by which provision, read with this section, the amount of the appropriation of the income of a public officer for the benefit of his creditors has been fixed (4)

"Pay and allowances"—Nor is the pay or allowance of a person subject to the Indian Marine Act, below the position of a gazetted officer, liable to attachment (5)

"Wages of labourers and domestic servants."—Labourers are persons who earn their daily bread by personal, manual labour or in occupations which require little or no art, skill, or previous education Their wages may depend on the amount they do (6) For what is included in domestic servant, see cases noted (7) In England the attachment by any Court of Record or inferior Court of the wages of any servant, labourer, or workman was abolished in 1870 (8)

"An expectancy of succession"—This includes the right of a reversioner to succeed on the death of a Hindu widow if he happen to survive her (9) Also the life interest in the residue of the property of a testator ascertainable after full administration, (10) or a son's interest in his father's estate which was bequeathed to his mother for life, (11) or the life interest which a judgment debtor would be entitled to in an estate after the payment of certain charges, cannot be sold in execution (12) Where however a Mahomedan by deed granted property to his wife on condition that if she had a child by him, the grant should be a perpetual mokurruri and if no child then a life mokurruri with remainder to the settlor's two sons the interest of one of such sons was attachable, (13) so is the interest of a person who makes a gift of land to a Hindu widow for her maintenance such interest being a vested interest in the land (14)

"Other merely contingent or possible right or interest"—As for instance, a vendor's right in the balance of purchase money payable on the execution of a conveyance, so long as the conveyance is not executed, (1) or a claim under a future award of arbitration, (2) the interest in pre-empted property of a successful pre-emptor who has not yet paid the pre-emptive price fixed by his decree, (3) but property the subject of an existing suit is attachable, though the Court would order its sale at the fittest and most proper time (4) A vested remainder in a house is attachable (5) A mere right to receive profits which are not yet due is not attachable (6)

"Right to future maintenance"—The mere right to future maintenance cannot be attached (7) This includes land assigned to a widow in lieu of maintenance (8) but without any right of alienation (9) The right of a Hindu widow to reside in her husband's family house is a purely personal right and cannot be attached under this section (10) Formerly, the Court might order the party chargeable with the payment of an instalment of maintenance about to become due not to pay and the judgment debtor not to receive so that it be paid either to such person as the Court should direct or that an arrangement under sect 268 (O XXI r 16) for its collection or administration be made (11) This however has not been the practice since (12) An annuity given by will, not by any right of maintenance but out of the testator's bounty, is attachable, (13) so are arrears of maintenance already accrued due (14) The income of a fund in hands of trustees payable half yearly to the judgment debtor cannot be attached after the last payment has been made and before the next is payable there being no debt "owing or accruing" (15) but under the Code of 1859, an annuity charged on an estate could be attached at the instance of the person by whom it was then payable he having inherited the estate from the grantor of the annuity, (16) so can maintenance charged by deed on the grantor's property and recoverable by suit on non payment, (17) also in execution of a mortgage decree, the right to receive an allowance assigned to the judgment debtor's deceased wife in lieu of her share of landed property and inherited by him from her in mortgaged by him (1) So where a person sells property in consideration of a payment down and an annuity, the annuity is attachable even where the purchaser is the Court of Wards (2) But the income of property belonging to a married woman, subject to a restraint on anticipation accruing due after the date of a decree against such married woman's separate property under sect 8 of the Married Woman's Property Act, is not liable to attachment in execution of such decree (3) An hereditary grant of an allowance of paddy out of the nicharam of certain land is not a right to future maintenance (4) It has been recently held that this exemption of a right to future maintenance does not affect property or an interest in property which was granted for maintenance, and that thus the crop standing on land allotted to a widow for maintenance can be attached (5) A distinction has been recognized between a right to receive money for purposes of maintenance properly so called and a right or interest in property which forms a fund or estate out of which an annuity is paid to the grantee—the former is a personal right and inalienable, the latter can be alienated Where an appellant conveyed his estate to his son, but retained a right to receive from him a certain sum annually it was held that this was not a right to future maintenance, but a valuable interest in the property (6)

61. The Local Government, with the previous sanction of Partial exemption of the Governor General in Council, may, by agricultural produce general or special order published in the local official Gazette, declare that such portion of agricultural produce, or of any class of agricultural produce, as may appear to the Local Government to be necessary for the purpose of providing until the of the judgment-debtor and his family shall, in the case of all agriculturists or of any class of agriculturists, be exempted from liability to attachment or sale in execution of a decree

Attachment of agricultural produce—Sec O XXI rr 44 and 45
 These provisions, which in the original Bill affected “growing crops” only, have been extended to all “agricultural produce” While it has been considered that the Court should attach such produce, which will now in all cases be treated as moveable property by taking it into its possession and custody at the same time the procedure relating to the “actual seizure” of moveables cannot be applied, in its entirety to a growing crop, and having regard to the special provisions contained in O XXI r 74 with respect to the sale of agricultural produce considerable objection has been deemed to exist against allowing such produce to be ordinarily removed on attachment In these circumstances, in order to give proper effect to O XXI r 74, it has been enacted by O XXI r 44, post, that attachment should be effected by affixing a notice in situ on the field or threshing-floor and also, by way of greater caution, on the judgment debtor's ordinary place of residence. To meet special cases of persons, not residing in the actual neighbourhood, under the special orders of the Court, affixture on the house in which the judgment debtor carries on business, or personally works for gain, or in which he is known to have last resided or personally worked for gain, is allowed.

“Agricultural produce.”—The original proposal was to authorize the Court only to declare a fixed proportion of any growing crop to be exempted, but it was universally considered impracticable. It has been considered to be clear that the amount to be exempted, not merely of growing crops but of all “agricultural produce,” must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. As a matter of working practice, the original proposal to treat a proportion of growing crops as free from liability to attachment and sale could not be conveniently carried into effect. It was therefore proposed that the growing crop, as such, should be attached, but that the proportion to be exempted should, when ascertained, be “released from attachment,” and should be free from liability to sale. Subsequently, however, the words “be exempted from liability to attachment or sale in execution of a decree” were substituted for the words “be released from attachment and shall be free from liability to sale in execution of a decree,” in order, it was said, to make it clear that the exemption extends to produce which has been hypothecated. The provisions of O XXI r. 44 authorizing the judgment debtor to attend to his crop while under attachment, were thought sufficient to prevent any hardship arising from this procedure. The proviso, originally appended to the draft of this section by way of greater caution, saving any first charge which by any law is vested in the Government for the recovery of revenue, or in a landholder for the recovery of rent, has been omitted, because it was considered that the special and local enactments, by which the first charges in favour of rent or revenue are created are sufficiently safeguarded by sect 3, ante.

1 62. (1) No person executing any process under this Code directing or authorizing seizure of Seizure of property in dwelling house moveable property shall enter any dwelling-house after sunset and before sunrise.

(2) No outer door of a dwelling house shall be broken open unless such dwelling-house is in the occupancy of the judgment-debtor and he refuses or in any way prevents access thereto, but when the person executing any such process has duly gained access to any dwelling-house, he may break open the door of any room in which he has reason to believe any such property to be.

(3) Where a room in a dwelling-house is in the actual occupancy of a woman who, according to the customs of the country, does not appear in public, the person executing the process shall give notice to such woman that she is at liberty to withdraw; and, after allowing reasonable time for her to withdraw and giving her reasonable facility for withdrawing, he may enter such room for the purpose of seizing the property, using at the same time every precaution, consistent with these provisions, to prevent its clandestine removal.

Seizure of property—This section, save for the first sentence, corresponds with sect 271 of Act X of 1877, with the exception that in that Act the words "house or other building" were used instead of "dwelling house" the first sentence was added by Act XIV of 1882 According to that Act, sub clause (2) commenced with the words "or shall break open any outer door of a dwelling house" instead of the words in italics while sub clause (3) commenced "Provided that if the room be" instead of "Where a room in a dwelling-house," while the word "break" in sub clause (2) has been substituted for "unfascn and" The second sub clause has been amended to bring it into line with sect 55, ante

"Any outer door"—It was formerly held that he might break open the door of a shop, (1) or remove locks on the door of a golah and put on other locks for safe custody (2) Under the earlier Codes, which prohibited the breaking open of any outer door of a dwelling house it was held the privilege extended to anout house or other office annexed to the dwelling house but not to a building such as a storehouse or barn standing at a distance and not forming parcel of it (3) By the amendment introduced by the present Code the judgment debtor's refusal to grant access to his dwelling house justifies the person executing to break open any outer door, that is, any outer door of the dwelling house of the defendant but not of the house of a stranger

"Break open"—A person executing a process for attachment of moveables having gained access to the house was held to have a right to remove the lock from the door of a room in which he had reasonable ground for supposing moveable property was lodged (4) A bailiff who breaks the doors of a third person in execution of a decree against the judgment debtor is a trespasser if it turns out that the person or goods of the debtor are not in the house (5)

"Actual occupancy of a woman"—This provision does not apply to the arrest of a purdanasheen woman (6)

under the decree gets a good title against all persons whom the suit binds (1) The quantity and nature of right and interest existing in the debtor at the time of attachment and advertisement for sale, alone pass by the sale (2) But in mortgage suits the right, title, and interest, both of mortgagor and the mortgagee, is passed: the right of the mortgagor as it stood when he made the mortgage, and not merely as it stood at the time of the Court sale (3) An auction-purchaser is bound to satisfy himself of the value, quantity, and title of the thing sold, just as much as if he were purchasing the same under private contract (4) Where the sale is not vitiated by fraud, the only extent to which the purchaser can claim relief is that indicated by sect 315 (now r 93, post) (5) In the case of Registrar's sales in the High Court, compensation is also allowable for errors and misstatements as to particulars of description of the property (6)

Ordinarily the purchaser buys merely the right, title, and interest of the judgment debtor with all its defects (7) This was expressly stated in the certificate under the Code of 1859 and is, in fact, ordinarily the case now, though what could have been and what was sold is a mixed question of law and fact to be determined on the whole of the proceedings and the facts of the particular case (8) As stated ordinarily, the personal right, title, and interest of the debtor passes. In certain cases the estate passes as in the case of a Hindu widow where the proceeding, though nominally against the heir, is really against her as representing the estate, (9) or in those cases under the rent law where a sale passes not merely the right, title, and interest of the tenant but the tenure itself (10) Leaving out of consideration this latter case, which is subject to certain statutory rules, the purchaser simply gets what the debtor, whether

So if a person sells property covered by a mortgage, but, suppressing that fact, obtains the value of the property unencumbered, he may be estopped from saying that the purchaser took it subject to the lien (7)

Though the possession of an auction purchaser differs in some points (8) from that of a purchaser at a private sale, yet a purchaser at an ordinary execution sale is in privity with, and the representative in interest of, the judgment debtor so as to be affected by the latter's admissions affecting the property taken and estoppels binding on him (9) An auction purchaser's conduct in buying is only some evidence of an admission of title in the judgment-debtor, which he can explain or rebut. He is not estopped from setting up a title independent of that based on his purchase (10)

The purchaser takes the property subject to that which affects what he has purchased, viz., the property. Mere personal obligations not affecting the land do not pass. So it has been held that without notice he is not bound corresponds with a portion of sect 260 of Act VIII of 1809. The wording there was "the purchase was made on behalf of another person, not the certified purchaser, though by agreement the name of the certified purchaser was used". This was altered to "the purchase was made on behalf of any other person, or on behalf of some one through whom such other person claims" by sect 317 of Act X of 1877, and the same Act added the second sub clause except the portions in italics. The present Code in the first sub clause has substituted "any person claiming title under a purchase certified by the Court" (which will include both the purchaser and his successor in title) for "the certified purchaser," and added the words in italics in the second sub clause. It had been previously held that the expression "certified purchaser" included the person standing in the shoes of the Court purchaser (1).

It only applies to certified purchasers at sales under this Code, and not to revenue sale purchasers (2). It is not applicable to a case under the Public Demands Recovery Act (I of 1895 B C) (3).

Prior to the amendments made by the present Code there was a diversity of opinion as to whether this section included a suit by a judgment creditor against the certified purchaser who purchased benamce for the judgment debtor: the Calcutta High Court holding that such a suit was not barred by this section as it stood prior to this Code and the Madras High Court and the Allahabad High Court holding otherwise, (8) and the additions now made to the second sub clause affirm the latter decisions. The section does not preclude a suit by A, whose property was sold against the certified purchaser, who after the sale agreed to sell the property to A (9). "Against"—Where A in execution sold the share of B, the judgment-debtor, in a house, and it was purchased by C, the son of B, and subsequently A attached and sold the same share in execution, D being the purchaser, a suit for possession by D against C was dismissed as being within this section (1) This section is not intended to interfere with benamee transactions generally, and a suit by a certified purchaser who purchased benamee, for the property purchased against the real purchaser who was honestly in possession failed, (2) and in such a suit the real owner might set up a defence that the certified purchaser was the apparent owner only and a mere trustee (3) So where the assignee of the certified purchaser sued for possession against a third party, the latter could show that the sale was benamee and in fraud of creditors, (4) and a person in possession of the purchased property, when sued for rents and profits by the certified purchaser, may set up a defence that the certified purchaser was only a benameedar on his behalf, (5) even a decree holder may sue the certified purchaser for the properties purchased by him benamee for the judgment debtor and of which the judgment debtor was in possession (6) When the certified purchaser purchased benamee for A and then conveyed the property to B for A's benefit the property could, it was held, be taken in execution by the creditors of A, but it was doubted whether they could have done so if it had not been conveyed to B, (7) but that doubt purchaser The section does not preclude a person purchasing benamee from setting up his title against a person who is not the certified purchaser and does not claim through him (8)

"Purchase certified"—The section does not bar a suit where the certified purchaser does not defend the suit against the beneficial owner, and the defence cannot be taken by a defendant who is not the certified purchaser, (9) likewise where the certified purchaser admits the plaintiff's claim and states he has made over the certificate to him, (10) nor under the wording of the previous Codes did it preclude a suit against a person who derived his title from the certified purchaser (11) such as his mortgagee or his heir (12) The Bombay High Court dissented from this, holding that "certified purchaser"

in the purchase of the property by the plaintiff purchaser, (1) and the amount of the sale of the property by the plaintiff purchaser in each last decree.

Where the property was bought for an adequate sum by a purchaser of a party in the name of the plaintiff, a suit against the purchaser and his mother was maintainable (2). It is also maintainable where the purchase is made by a purchaser of a joint Hindu family with plaintiff (3) also where, in a suit for partition by a Hindu family, the plaintiff purchaser is for the plaintiff's father with plaintiff (4). It is not necessary that the certificate should have been actually granted to the certified purchaser, provided he obtained it pending the suit to set aside the purchase (5).

"On the ground"—A bona fide purchase is not illegal, but if the bona fide nature of the purchase is the sole ground, the suit is not maintainable, but otherwise if the purchaser acknowledges that his purchase is bona fide and gives up possession or waives his right or returns the property to the real owner, (6) or where he was the assignee of the real owner, a minor, and never asserted a right to the property purchased (7) or where he purchased while the plaintiff was in possession of the property, and agreed to execute a conveyance and gave the real owner the sale certificate and delivery order (8). Similarly where the plaintiff, having been in possession for eleven years, sued on a title acquired by long possession against the assignee of the certified purchaser, (9) or against the certified purchaser, on the ground of an existing possession which had continued eight years from the time of the sale, the suit was maintainable, (10) but the suit must not be based on the ground of the purchase being bona fide, but on some other independent ground. So a suit by the alleged real owner who was in possession against the certified purchaser for a declaration of title is not maintainable (11) nor where the certified purchaser acknowledged that he had bought a portion of the property on behalf of the plaintiff's predecessor in title unless that acknowledgment were accompanied by some act which would operate as a valid transfer of the property. So where the certified purchaser by a consent decree admitted that his mother was entitled to a share of his father's estate and then purchased in execution of a decree, property mortgaged to his father, the representatives of the mother were debarred under this section from recovering a portion of the property (1)

“Purchase was made on behalf of the plaintiff”—The former words were “on behalf of any other person” This does not include an agreement by the purchaser to sell after his purchase, (2) but it does include a case where the defendant as the alleged agent of the decree-holders, who had been refused permission to purchase, purchased the property, and the decree holders, hearing of the purchase, supplied the purchase money, ratified the purchase, and agreed to take a conveyance after confirmation of the sale (3) It does not apply to a case of a purchase made by a member of a joint Hindu family with joint funds, (4) nor in a suit for partition by a Hindu son, to a purchase by an outsider benamsee for his, the plaintiff's, father with family funds (5) Nor does it apply to a case where the person setting up the benamsee character of the purchaser does not claim under the certified purchaser or the alleged real purchaser So the purchaser in execution of a mortgage decree may prove that the certified purchaser of the interest of one of the mortgagors in a sale in execution made subject to the mortgage was benamsee for the mortgagor, (6) and a decree holder may sue the certified purchaser for sale of the properties purchased by him benamsee for the judgment debtor and of which the judgment debtor is in possession (7) But the Allahabad High Court held otherwise, holding that the question of who the plaintiff might be was not material, and that all suits against the certified purchaser were within the section (8) The second sub clause now provides an exception to this decision It certainly covers suits by the beneficial owner or the successors in title of the beneficial owner (9) This section contemplates a suit by a person claiming to be the beneficial owner against the certified purchaser and not a suit where a third party asserts the certified purchaser is not the beneficial owner, in a suit by the certified purchaser, (10) nor a suit by a creditor of the real owner (11)

“Fraudulently or without the consent,” etc.—Of course where a case comes under the second paragraph the claim cannot be barred by the first (12) The earlier portion of the second sub clause of this section embodies

67. The Local Government, with the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council, may, by notification in the local official Gazette, make rules for any local area imposing conditions in respect of the sale of any class of interests in land in execution of decrees for the payment of money, where such interests are so uncertain or undetermined as, in the opinion of the Local Government, to make it impossible to fix their value.

Sales of land—This section was introduced into the Code by sect 327 of Act X of 1877. The present section only re-enacts the first clause of that section, omitting the words "from time to time" after "may" and adding the words in italics. The remainder of the section formerly ran, "and if, when this Code comes into operation in any local execution of decrees are in force therein, in force, or may, from time to time, with the sanction of the Governor General in Council, modify the same. All rules so made or continued, and all such modifications of the same, shall be published in the local official Gazette, and shall thereupon have the force of law"

DELEGATION TO COLLECTOR OF POWER TO EXECUTE DECREES AGAINST IMMOVEABLE PROPERTY.

68. The Local Government may, with the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council, declare, by notification in the local official Gazette, that in any local area the execution of decrees in cases in which a Court has ordered any immoveable property to be sold, or the execution of any particular kind of such decrees, or the execution of decrees ordering the sale of any particular kind of, or interest in, immoveable property, shall be transferred to the Collector

69. The provisions set forth in the Third Schedule shall apply to all cases in which the execution of a decree has been transferred under the last preceding section.

70 (1) The Local Government may make rules consistent with the aforesaid provisions—

- (a) for the transmission of the decree from the Court to the Collector, and for regulating the procedure of the Collector and his subordinates in executing the same, and for retransmitting the decree from the Collector to the Court,
- (b) conferring upon the Collector or any gazetted subordinate of the Collector all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise in the execution of the decree if the execution thereof had not been transferred to the Collector,
- (c) providing for orders made by the Collector or any gazetted subordinate of the Collector, or orders made on appeal with respect to such orders, being subject to appeal to, and revision by, superior revenue authorities as nearly as may be as the orders made by the Court, or orders made on appeal with respect to such orders, would be subject to appeal to, and revision by, appellate or revisional Courts under this Code or other law for the time being in force if the decree had not been transferred to the Collector

(2) A power conferred by rules made under sub section (1) upon the Collector or any gazetted subordinate of the Collector or upon any appellate or revisional authority, shall not be exercisable by the Court or by any Court in exercise of any appellate or revisional jurisdiction which it has with respect to decrees or orders of the Court

Transfer to Collector—This subject is dealt with in these sections in the next section, and in the third schedule to which the other sections of the last Code have been transferred. The provisions except in one particular are with some verbal alterations the same as those of the last Code. The exception referred to is the necessity for the record of reasons for an adjournment under clause 10 of the schedule. The words “and record of reasons” any such declaration which appeared in section 320 of the last Code, have been omitted. The last three paragraphs of sect 320 of the last Code were added to that Code by sect 30 of Act VII of 1858 (1). The section provides that the Local Government may frame rules for regulating the procedure of the Collector and his subordinates in execution of decrees transferred to him (2). The general provisions of the Code do not apply to proceedings held by the Collector for the execution of such decrees (3). When a notification has been made, the Civil Courts cease to have jurisdiction to execute the decree (4). It has been held that a Judge can recall a case sent to the Collector (5). But this has also apparently been held to be not so, (6) or at least doubtful (7).

The Collector may cancel his own order of postponement of the sale (8). In Allahabad it is held that where the Civil Court is satisfied that the land which is ordered to be sold or any portion of it is ancestral, it should transfer the decree for execution to the Collector so far as regards ancestral land only (14).

Stay of Sale—This section corresponds with sect 244 of Act VIII of 1859. The section then commenced "When in any district where land, paying revenue to Government is ordinarily sold by the Collector as provided in sect 248, the property attached consists" etc, and proceeded to provide that "the Court may authorize the Collector, on security for the amount of the decree or for the value of such land or share being given to make provision for such satisfaction" etc. The present wording of first sub clause was adopted by sect 326 of Act X of 1877, which also eliminated the proviso as to security. The second sub clause was added by sect 326 of Act XIV of 1882. The present Code has omitted the

The section does not apply to a decree which directs the sale of land or of a share of land in pursuance of a contract specifically affecting the same (1)

"The Court"—That is, the Court executing the decree That Court should deal with it itself and not in deference to the opinion of a superior Judge who forwards the recommendation of the Collector (2)

"May authorize"—It is discretionary with the Court to authorize or not as it thinks fit It is bound to hear any objections made by the decree holder and any evidence adduced by him (3) The only indulgence the Court may sanction is to allow the judgment debtor a reasonable period for satisfying the decree by the temporary alienation of his property A Court executing a decree cannot vary its terms by authorizing payment by instalments, (4) while the property remains in the possession of the judgment debtor (5)

"Collector to provide"—Execution cannot be taken out against property under the management of the Collector As against such property, the time it is under such management shall be excluded in reckoning limitation (6) Possession cannot be given to an alienee of the judgment debtor of property under such management but damages can be awarded (7) may, with the consent of the mortgagee or incumbrancer, order that the property be sold free from the mortgage or charge, giving to the mortgagee or incumbrancer the same interest in the proceeds of the sale as he had in the property sold ;

first, in defraying the expenses of the sale ;

secondly, in discharging the amount due under the decree, thirdly, in discharging the interest and principal monies due on subsequent incumbrances (if any), and,

fourthly, rateably among the holders of decrees for the payment of money against the judgment-debtor, who have, prior to the sale of the property, applied to the Court which passed the decree ordering such sale for execution of such decrees, and have not obtained satisfaction thereof

(2) Where all or any of the assets liable to be rateably distributed under this section are paid to a person not entitled to receive the same, any person so entitled may sue such person to compel him to refund the assets

Object and scope of section—Under the Code of 1859 the attaching creditor was entitled to be first paid out of the proceeds of the property attached and sold, the surplus only being liable to distribution rateably among subsequent attaching creditors whereas under the Code of 1877 and subsequent and present Code it is immaterial at whose instance an attachment is placed Every creditor who has applied is entitled to a rateable distribution (1) The present provisions prevent multiplicity of procedure and that scramble by several judgment debtors which used to take place under the Code of 1859 (2) The section draws a sharp distinction between attachment and realization (3) and an attaching creditor is entitled to no priority over other creditors until a sale at his instance has actually taken place

The object of the section is two fold Firstly to prevent unnecessary multiplicity of execution proceedings, to obviate in a case where there are many decree holders, each competent to execute his decree by attachment and sale of a particular property the necessity of each and every one separately attaching and separately selling that property The other object is to secure an equitable administration of the property by placing all the decree holders upon the same footing, and making the property rateably divisible among them, instead of allowing one to exclude all the others merely because he happened to be the first who had attached and sold the property (1).

Where it was contended on behalf of the defendants that, having regard to the terms of the section an attachment made by the plaintiffs ensured for the benefit of all persons holding decrees for money against the same judgment-debtor, and who complied with the conditions specified in the section, that is to say that, provided the defendants have, prior to the realization, applied to the Court holding the assets for execution of decrees for money against the same judgment-debtor and have not obtained satisfaction thereof, they are, without any attachment of their own, entitled to share rateably with the plaintiffs in the proceeds of the sale, although in the absence of the plaintiffs attachment they could not themselves, after the judgment-debtor's death, have enforced execution against this property, it was held that argument was to some extent favoured by the language of the section, but that it was clear that this section cannot be read absolutely literally. If it were to be read literally, without any regard to its real object and policy, the result would be an absurdity, because the only condition expressly required is the existence of an application for execution made by the persons specified prior to the realization irrespective altogether of the result of such applications or any objections to them however well founded. But it has been held, and it could not otherwise have been held, that an application for execution which was barred by limitation (2) or an application which had for any reason been rejected, would not entitle the applicant to share rateably under this section, and therefore it is clear that one must give the section a common sense construction, and see what sort of case it really provides for. The object of the section being as above stated, it was not desired to enlarge in any way the rights of decree holders or place at their disposal the proceeds of property which they could not have themselves attached. It entitled to share in the proceeds only those decree holders who could have themselves attached and sold the property. It was not meant to enable a decree holder to indirectly get the benefits of an execution which he could not himself have enforced directly. Where the decree holders are persons who could have themselves attached and sold the property then but only then an attachment and sale by one is correctly described as ensuring for the benefit of all (3).

The provisions of this section show that when property is sold in execution of a decree it is sold not only for the realization of the money due under that particular decree, but of all other decrees the holders of which have applied for execution. When property is sold in execution of a decree it cannot be sold again at the instance of another decree holder, who may have attached it before the attachment effected by the decree holder, under whose decree it is actually sold and when a judicial sale takes place all previous attachments effected upon the property sold fall to the ground (4).

Where in execution of two decrees certain properties were sold the proceeds of which were sufficient to pay the decree holders, it was held that on the interposition of a creditor who had not attached, the Court was right in selling a third property, as such creditor would be entitled to share, with the result that it could not be said that by the amount realized from the first sale the decrees under execution were satisfied (1)

The section relates to procedure only, and was intended to afford an additional facility to decree holders. It does not interfere with substantive rights or the maintenance of a suit, notwithstanding that a party may not have availed himself of its facilities (2) On the other hand, failure to participate does not prevent a creditor executing his decree in any other manner (3)

Permission granted to a judgment creditor to set off the amount of the purchase money payable for the property sold against the debt due to him under his decree must be taken to be granted subject to the provisions of this section (4)

The former section was held not to apply to a deposit made by a judgment-debtor under sect 310A (now O XXI r 89) of the former Code (5)

An order under this section affects only interests existing at the time. The insolvency of the debtor introduces a new state of things from the date of the insolvency, but as regards sums accrued due prior to the date of the insolvency, the order under this section creates rights which are not affected by the insolvency (6)

It has been held that sect 490 (now O XXXVIII r 12) did not empower a decree holder to share in the distribution of property he has attached, and that though there was no necessity to re attach, an application for execution was imperative (7)

Under the last Code it was in some cases held that when a person desired to share in the assets realized by a sale in execution he must apply to the Court in which those assets were for the execution of his decree and if it were found that property attached by an inferior Court was already or thereafter became subject to an attachment issued from a superior Court the decree holder must have applied to transfer his application to the higher Court if he desired to secure the application of the attached property and its proceeds to the satisfaction of his decree (8) A contrary view was adopted in the Calcutta High Court, where it was held that this section did not require the transfer of the decree to the Court where the process of realization took place as a condition precedent to an application under sect 285 (now 63) of the former Code (1) And this amount to an attachment, (3) but if a debt was attached no equitable assignment of it was valid against another creditor who subsequently obtained an order under this section (4) An application does not therefore operate as a substantive attachment, and will lapse, as formerly was the case, when the original attachment terminates

It is nowhere provided either that an application for distribution cannot decree-holder, or that notice of such an application having been made must of necessity be given to the other decree holders (5) After an order for distribution has been made, and before the funds have been actually distributed, it is open to one of the decree holders to maintain a suit for a declaration that the decree of a next decree-holder is collusive, and that he is not entitled to share in the sale proceeds (6)

Assets held—That is available for distribution in execution of a decree The words of the last Code were assets "realized by sale or otherwise in execution of a decree" Assets meant the proceeds of the sale of the property sold in execution (7) Moneys paid into Court by sale or otherwise were assets from the moment of their payment into Court (8) "Realized" meant that property had been converted into or obtained in cash, or some other form available for immediate distribution There is nothing in the word itself which required that the process should take place as the result of any ulterior proceeding in the course of execution (9) Assets were realized when the whole of the proceeds were paid into Court (10) But the word "realized" was however followed by words which showed that the realization must have taken place in a particular way, viz in execution (1) from the property of the judgment debtor, (2) the proceeds being "assets" even before the sale becomes absolute (3) Where therefore assets were realized but not in process of execution the section did not apply, as where moneys were paid by a judgment-debtor under arrest (4) or paid into Court (5) voluntarily, though no doubt under pressure of the decrees, or were realized by private sale of properties attached, the assets being realized under the section, not by the attachment but by the sale (6)

Although this section is wider than sect 295 of the last Code, yet the effect of sects 275 and 310A of the last Code (now represented by O XXI r 55 and O XXI r 89) remains unaltered, and therefore sums paid into Court for a particular purpose under O XXI r 55 are not assets under this section, (7) neither are sums paid into Court under O XXI r 89 (8)

The object of the provision should be to expedite and cheapen the execution of decrees against the same person by adjusting the claims of rival decree-holders without the necessity for separate proceedings. If, however, the property is not sufficient to satisfy all the claimants, the wording of the last Code as judicially interpreted, held out an inducement to the attaching creditors to settle out of Court with the judgment debtor at the expense of the other decree holders (9). The language of the section has been altered and widened by referring to assets held available for distribution rather than to assets "realized in execution". It is necessary of course that assets in order to be "held" must be realized. It is not however necessary now that the realization must have been in execution as that phrase was interpreted under the former Code. It is sufficient that having been realized (and probably that will be held to be when the entire amount due from a purchaser has been paid into Court) they are available for distribution in execution. PART IV

SUITS IN PARTICULAR CASES.

SUITS BY OR AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT OR PUBLIC OFFICERS IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITY

79 (1) Suits by or against the Government shall be instituted by or against the Secretary of State for India in Council.

(2) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to limit or otherwise affect any information exhibited by the Advocate General in exercise of the power declared by section 111 of the East India Company Act, 1813.

Suits—This is sect 416 of the last Code. Sects 417–421 are now rr 2–6 of O XXVII, the first rule of that Order, dealing with pleadings, being new. Sect 422 is now r 27 of O V. Sect 423 is r 7 of O XXVII. Sects 424 and 425 are now sects 80, 81. Sects 426 and 427 are r 8 of O XXVII. Sects 428 and 429 are now sects 81 and 82.

The liability of the Secretary of State for India in Council to be sued depends on the statute 21 & 22 Vict c 106, for the better government of India, and turns principally upon the construction of sect 65 of that Statute (1) Whether a suit will lie at the instance of Government is a matter of substantive law. As regards the Court in which such a suit assuming it to lie should be brought, reference should be made in the case of the High Courts to their Letters Patent, in other cases to the various Indian Civil Courts Acts, and to sects 16–20 of this Code (2) Whether and when a suit will lie against a public officer is a question

(1) See for a recent decision in which the earlier cases are cited Jehangir v Secretary of State 27 B 189 (1902) and others cited in O Kinealy's C P C., notes to s 416.

(2) Id. see the notes to those sections and in particular as regards suits against Government, see those in which the question has arisen whether the Government may [Bipradas Dey v Secretary of State, 14 C. 262 n. (1884),

Subbaraja v Government, 1 M 286 (1862)] or may not be said to carry on business [Rundle v Secretary of State, 1 Hyde, 37 (1862–63), Doya Narain v Secretary of State, 14 C 256 (1887)]. Several suits have been decided in which the cause of action did not accrue within the local limits, and in which therefore those Courts could have had jurisdiction only if the Government could be held

of substantive law Judicial officers are protected by Act XVIII of 1850, but no such general protection is granted to executive officers (1) None of these matters are relevant to these provisions, which deal with the subject of procedure in a case properly instituted The statute first cited provides that the Secretary of State for India in Council may be sued as a body corporate, and this section provides that suits shall be so entitled (2) Where, however, a suit was wrongly brought against a Magistrate, the High Court, on appeal, allowed the name of the Magistrate to be struck out, and that of the Secretary of State for India in Council to be inserted (3)

Informations—The power of the Advocate General to exhibit informations in the nature of actions at law or Bills in Equity was expressly declared by sect 111 of the East India Company Act, 1813 (53 Geo 3, c 155), and kept alive by sect 2 of the Government of India Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will 4, c 85), and again by sect 1 of the Government of India Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict c 95), now merged in the statute of 1858 already mentioned (21 & 22 Vict c 106) The Governor General in Council is precluded by sect 22 of the Indian Councils Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict c 67), from legislative interference with the provisions of any of the enactments above quoted The question was considered whether sect 416 of the last Code appeared to exclude informations exhibited by the Advocate General, and whether it was therefore desirable to add a proviso saving such information And this has been done

State for India in Council, or against a public officer in respect of any act purporting to be done by such public officer in his official capacity, until the expiration of two months next after notice in writing has been, in the case of the Secretary of State in Council, delivered to, or left at the office of, a Secretary to the Local Government or the Collector of the district, and, in the case of a public officer, delivered to him or left at his office, stating the cause of action, the name, description and place of residence of the plaintiff and the relief which he claims, and the plaint shall contain a statement that such notice has been so delivered or left

"No suit"—The words "no suit" under the last Code were held to mean what they say, that is no suit of any kind, and the section was not confined to a particular class of suit, such as suits founded on tort and claiming damages

And it has been held under the present Code that this section applies to suits of every kind (1) The object of notice is to give the defendant breathing time, so as to enable him to determine whether reparation ought to be made, and the principle is applicable to any class of suit (2) The substitution of the words "any act" for "an act" points in the same direction Notice has, in consequence, been deemed necessary even when the remedy sought was an injunction, and though delay involved in the giving of notice might involve the commission of the wrong complained of before the suit was filed (3) But the objection for want of notice can only be taken by the Secretary of State, and where no relief is claimed against him it has been held that no notice is necessary (4)

"Shall be instituted."—That is, commenced The section says that no suit shall be instituted, not that it shall not be proceeded with or maintained The language of the section is imperative and absolutely debars a Court from entertaining a suit instituted without compliance with the provisions of the section A Court cannot under such circumstances stay proceedings and allow time to the plaintiff to serve the requisite notice, but its only course is to reject the plaint (5) It has, however, been held that there is nothing in the law to show that in case of any amendment of the plaint, necessitated by the alleged discovery of facts previously unknown to the plaintiff, the Secretary of State should have a further notice of two months, when the relief asked for is not altered by such amendment, and it only embodies certain further material in support of the plaintiff's contention (6) And where in an action already instituted against the Secretary of State, a public servant was also afterwards joined as defendant, who, however, was not sued for any act done by him independently of Government, and no separate relief was asked for against him no notice was held to be required in his case (7) Further there is nothing to prevent the defendant from waiving the notice or from being estopped by his conduct from pleading the want of it at the trial (8) Though the Secretary of State is not a necessary party to a suit to set aside a revenue sale, yet the Government has such an interest in the suit as would justify the Court in adding the Secretary of State as a party,⁽¹⁾ and this section, it has been held, does not prevent that being done⁽²⁾

Public officer—See as to the definition of this term, sect 2, ante The Official Trustee, (3) Official Assignee, (4) Administrator General, (5) a Collector acting as agent of the Court of Wards, and as such illegally seizing property, (6) and a Talukdari Settlement Officer, when acting as manager under Act XXI of 1881,⁽⁷⁾ or under sect 79A of Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom Act V of 1879),⁽⁸⁾ have been held to be public officers

"In respect of any act"—The words "in respect of an act purporting to be done by him in his official capacity" were introduced by Act XII of 1879 into sect 424 of the last Code under which it was held that the qualifications "in respect of an act, etc.," do not relate to the Secretary of State. They did not apply to the case of the Secretary of State in Council⁽⁹⁾. This is now made clear by the introduction of the words "by such public officer". The defendant must not only be a public officer, but the act must be done in his official capacity⁽¹⁰⁾. If not,⁽¹¹⁾ then the section does not apply. There must, however, be a distinct act by the public officer which is complained of to entitle him to notice, and so it has been held unnecessary where a Collector was made a party not in respect of any alleged illegal act by him, but on the application of the minor's personal guardians in order to protect the minor's title,⁽¹²⁾ and where a Collector was merely guardian ad litem. In such a case the suit is not against him at all, and he defends on behalf of the minor only⁽¹³⁾. To take a case out of this section it must be proved that there was something in the conduct of the Secretary of State which prevented the plaintiff from complying with its provisions (1)

Notice—The three requisites to be stated are (a) cause of action, (b) name and residence, (c) relief sought

The object of the section being merely to inform the defendant substantially of the ground of complaint, the words "stating the cause of action" should not be construed too strictly or narrowly (2) In considering the sufficiency of a notice on this point, it should not be read with the strictness with which a plaint should be read (3) A notice is sufficient if it substantially fulfils its object in informing the parties concerned generally of the nature of the suit intended to be filed (4)

The name of the intending plaintiff must be stated A notice given by a party who dies before suit does not enure, it has been held, for the benefit of his representative, and enable the latter to maintain the suit without giving a fresh notice, as the notice in such place does not give the name of the actual plaintiff (5) Further, the abode of the intending plaintiff must be stated (6) The amended section adds description of plaintiff And this applies to all plaintiffs if there are more than one

Lastly, the relief claimed should be stated Generally, and as regards all these matters, it may be said (to adopt the language of Pollock, C B), (7) it is, on the question of sufficiency, necessary "to impart a little common sense into notices of this kind," and to ascertain whether the object of the Legislature has been substantially and effectively carried out If no notice has been given, or it is held to be insufficient, the proper course, it has been held, is not to dismiss the suit, but to reject the plaint, and give an opportunity to serve a fresh notice (8)

"Plaint shall contain a statement"—The portion of this section relating to the plaint, containing a statement that such notice has been left or delivered in the manner prescribed by it, is separate from the earlier portion, which deals with the delivery of the notice two months before suit It is only when notice is not given that the suit is liable to be dismissed (or the plaint rejected) The suit, however may be proceeded with, if notice has been given in the manner prescribed, and subsequently the plaint is amended in order to state that fact (9)

by a Foreign State against private individuals, as distinguished from rights which one State in its political capacity, may have as against another State in its political capacity (1) The second proviso takes the place of clause (b) of sect 131 of the last Code It was thought that the language of that clause required restriction inasmuch as it appeared to confer on the head of a Foreign State a general power to litigate in respect of the private rights of its subjects It was considered, however, that the object of such litigation must be the enforcement of a private right vested in the head of the State or in an officer of the State as such, and the language has been modified accordingly A Foreign State can only obtain relief subject to the rules and pursuant to the practice of the Court in which it sues, and one of the conditions is that, like an individual, it will give discovery (2)

(2) An appointment under this section may be made for the purpose of a specified suit or of several specified suits, or for the purpose of all such suits as it may from time to time be necessary to prosecute or defend on behalf of the Prince or Chief

tion of the suit should be obtained from the Advocate General, or the Collector or other officer appointed by the Local Government (such as in Allahabad the Legal Remembrancer), (1) as the case may be. An Assistant Collector discharging the duties of the Collector during his illness cannot grant sanction under this section (2) The object of such sanction is to guard charitable trusts from abuse, and for that purpose to prevent such proceedings from being instituted for no other reason than because it is known that the costs will be payable out of the charity funds (3) Where, however, a person has capacity to sue, the motives that actuated him do not affect his capacity and will not by themselves defeat a suit for which sanction has been obtained (4) The Advocate General, Collector, or other officer is required to exercise his judgment before giving consent (5) Where the language of permission indicated that as regards the interest of the plaintiffs the Collector did not exercise his judgment, it was held to be a mere irregularity within sect 578 (now 99), post (6) But it has also been held, that the consent in writing must be a specific permission given to two or more persons by name, and that a permission given to one applicant by name "and another" is not a sufficient compliance with the terms of the section (7) The suit brought under this section must correspond with the sanction as no reliefs can be awarded which are not contained in the section (8) It has been held by the Allahabad High Court that the obtaining of sanction is a pre requisite for the institution of the suit, and that the section cannot be read as meaning merely that the Courts cannot proceed with the suit already instituted until that consent has been obtained, and that therefore if no valid consent is given before the institution of the suit, the mistake cannot be subsequently rectified unless by means of withdrawal, with permission to institute a fresh suit (9) The Advocate General may give consent to the institution of a suit, but not for the amendment of a defective suit (10) And the Court's action after the institution of the suit in making a defendant a plaintiff has been held not subject to the consent of the Advocate General (11) Nor is consent necessary for the amendment of the plaint by mentioning particulars of the breach of trust (12)

4. The trust must be a public one.—The section presupposes the existence of a public trust and a suit for the administration, either partially or completely, of that trust (1) It enables the persons mentioned therein to sue trustees to enforce the better administration of the trust (2) Where, however, it is said that the section presupposes a trust, this does not mean that the defendant must admit the trust before the section can apply, but that the suit must proceed upon the allegation of the existence of a trust which may or may not be admitted by the defendant (3)

Private trusts concern only individuals or families for private convenience or support By public trusts may be understood such as are constituted for the benefit either of the public at large, or of some considerable portion of it answering a particular description In private trusts the beneficial interest is vested absolutely in one or more individuals, who are, or within a certain time may be, definitely ascertained, and to whom therefore collectively, unless under some legal disability, it is, or within the allowed time will be, competent to control, modify, or determine the trust A public or charitable trust, on the other hand, has for its objects the members of an uncertain and fluctuating body, and the trust itself is of a permanent character (4) A trust is none the less a trust for a public purpose if its main object is the support of fakirs of a particular sect (5) The trust may be charitable, such as for the relief of the poor, or the advancement of learning, religion, or objects of general public utility, or religious, though all religious uses are charitable uses Though, therefore, the section, as originally enacted in the Code of 1877, did not contain the words "or religious," there is little doubt but that the Legislature intended the section to embrace both charitable and religious purposes (6) It was however, held that the corresponding section in the Code of 1877 did not apply to religious endowments, (7) and therefore in the Code of 1882 the section was altered to expressly include religious trusts, in consequence of these rulings and doubts which had been entertained. The contention that, while there exists the special enactment, XX of 1863, for the proper appropriation of endowments of lands relating to temples, the words "religious purposes" should be considered as referring only to cases where the endowments do not relate to temples, has been overruled (1).

The public trust may also be either express or constructive. The first are those which are raised and created by act of the parties, and are declared by them either in word or writing. A constructive trust (to which this section also, though not the English Statute, applies) (2) is one arising, not by the act of the party, but by operation of law, where a trustee gains some personal advantage by availing himself, and through the medium of his situation as trustee (3). It is imposed on such a person to prevent him from holding for his own benefit an advantage gained by reason of the fiduciary relation subsisting between him and others, and for whose benefit only it is his duty to act (4). So, if a lease were the subject-matter of a public trust, a constructive trust would arise if a trustee renewed the lease in his own name. He would, in such case, be deemed to be a trustee for those interested in the original term. And this would be equally so if the trustee was trustee of right or trustee de son tort. And were there a breach of such constructive trust, by making away with the renewed lease or not applying its benefits to the purposes of the trust, there would be such a breach of trust as is referred to in this section (5). It has been recently held that where it is proved that certain property has been held for many generations for such purposes as the support of shikhs, and there is no evidence that the property was ever held for any other purpose, the Court ought to presume the existence of a charitable or religious trust within the meaning of these sections (6).

Where it was objected that the section was limited in its action to suits relating to property, and that its operation could not be extended to spiritual offices, it was held to be applicable where it is sought to remove the trustee from a religious office if, as the holder of such office, he is called upon to exercise business functions either as trustee or as manager of temple funds and properties, and thus necessarily possesses civil rights and consequent liabilities (7).

5 There must be a breach of trust or necessity for directions —
Nextly, assuming that there is a trust and trustee it must be ascertained whether there is a breach of trust. If not, then the direction of the Court must be required for the administration of the trust. A breach of trust is not necessary. It is sufficient if there be a public trust, and the direction of the Court is considered necessary for its administration (1). If there be neither a breach of trust (2) nor necessity for such directions, (3) then the section does not apply. As to evidence of breach of trust and the grounds which will justify removal for breach of trust, see cases below (4).

6 The suit must be for relief of the kind mentioned—Lastly though some or even all of the other elements stated in the section are found to exist, a suit will not be within it unless the relief sought therein is that which is expressly or impliedly mentioned in the section (5). No difficulty arises as regards the relief expressly mentioned in clauses (a) to (g). Contention has ever taken place as to what may be held to be included in the words “such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require”.

The general clause ought to be read with the five preceding specified clauses, and the nature of the relief which may be properly granted under it is of the same character as the reliefs which may be granted under the preceding clauses. The five specified clauses are not merely illustrative, but furnish an indication of the nature of the relief which may be granted in a suit under this section (6). This clause must be read with what has preceded as referring to further relief to which the party may be entitled, which arises out of the existence of the trust in respect of which the suit has been brought (7). On this ground it has been held that a suit which has been instituted simply and solely for the purpose of having a declaration that certain property is trust-property, and which was in no way a suit for the administration of the trust, or the removal of the trustees, or for any of the purposes referred to was not within the section (8). It may, however, be that in a suit for such purposes a declaration may be incidental and ancillary thereto (9). Within the words

"further or other relief" is, it has been held, a decree for an account (1) This is now expressly mentioned in clause (d) Before a scheme can be settled for the management of a temple and its funds, an account of the trust property must be taken Until the trust funds are ascertained it is impossible to settle a scheme (2) The Calcutta High Court has in one case held that a suit for the removal of a trustee, and for the recovery of trust property from the hands of a third party to whom it has been improperly alienated by the trustee, falls within the section (3) But this decision has been dissented from in the same Court, (4) in which it was held that persons claiming a title purely adverse to a trust are not proper parties to a suit for the execution of the trust The Allahabad High Court has also held that the alienees are not proper parties, that a prayer for recovery of possession is not entertainable under this section, and that a suit for such purpose could be instituted only by the trustee (5)

The High Courts at Calcutta, (6) Bombay, (7) and Allahabad (8) have held that in a suit under this section the Court may remove a trustee hostilely for breach of trust, and that the section applies both to contentious and non contentious cases Such relief was held to be involved in clause (b) of the former section, or to be included in "further or other relief" The Madras High Court, however held though at one time there was a difference of opinion on the point, that a suit to remove a trustee did not lie under this section (9) A prayer for removal might however be inserted where the right of suit existed independently of, and the suit was not brought under this section (10) The amended section makes it now clear that it applies both to non contentious and contentious suits, and clause (a) expressly mentions the removal of a trustee

As clauses (b) and (c) allow of the appointment of new trustees and the vesting of the property in new trustees, it follows that the Court can take possession from the old trustee who has been removed and give it to the new trustee. this section has the character of a summary proceeding. It possesses all the characteristics of a suit under sect 9 of the Code (1). Where a suit which is not within the section is instituted in a District Court, it has been held that the Court should not dismiss the suit, but should deal with it under sect 57, clause (a) (now O VII r 10), and return the plaint to be presented to the proper Court (2). So, also, where a Subordinate Judge held that this section was a bar to the suit, no consent having been obtained, it was held that he should not have proceeded to dispose of the case, but should have returned the plaint to be presented to the Court having jurisdiction to try the suit (3).

"Any other Court"—With reference to the words "any other Court empowered on that behalf," it has been held that the notification empowering the Court should not be directed to a particular judge and should not purport to deal with a particular litigation which on the date of the notification was pending before another Court (4).

Execution—So far as a decree under this section orders particular acts to be performed by the defendants in the management of the trust, it may be enforced by their imprisonment or by the attachment of their property, or both (5). And in order to obtain the removal of trustees who have infringed the scheme, the latter may be amended so as to include a provision for removal, and it is not necessary to file a separate suit (6). In the under-mentioned case (7) application was refused as the requirements of sects 235 (j) and 260 of the former Code had been ignored. Where an order was held not to invest a suit with a representative character, a person not on the record and not a member of the community of the plaintiffs but claiming certain rights under the decree, was held to have no right to apply to compel the observance of the scheme directed by the decree (8). The directions in a scheme framed may be enforced in execution on application by persons interested (9).

Settling a scheme—Settling a scheme under this section is largely a matter of discretion, and the scheme will not be interfered with in appeal unless the discretion has been improperly exercised or the Court has failed to give due consideration to matters which it was bound to consider (10).

(2) An appeal may lie from an original decree passed ex parte.

(3) No appeal shall lie from a decree passed by the Court with the consent of parties.

Appeal.—An appeal is a stage in and part of the proceedings in a suit (1) There must be a suit, for if there is none there can be no decree, and therefore no appeal (2) It is the removal of a cause from an inferior to a superior Court for the purpose of testing the soundness of the decision of the former Court, (3) and the lodging of an appeal is thus equivalent to an allegation that the decree is wrong and that the reasons which led to it are as stated in the judgment insufficient (4) It is a hearing before another tribunal, being in this distinguished from a review which is the reconsideration of the same subject by the same Judge (5) The function of an Appellate Court is to determine what decree the Court below ought to have made It may affirm, reverse, or vary the decree under appeal (6) The rule upon which the Privy may either embody the result of its decision upon every question in the decree in the form of a declaration or otherwise, or it may not do so. Cases of this last mentioned description, again, sub-divide into two classes, in one of which the decree is supported by the decision upon each of the questions determined, and in the other it is in spite of the decision upon some of those questions, as, for instance, where a suit fails upon the question of limitation, but the question of title is found for the plaintiff (1). The mere fact that a Court has gone on to determine a question which it could not determine so as to bind the parties does not give a right of appeal against a decision on such a question (2).

The former section allowed an appeal from any part of the decree which may also be of a provisional or preliminary character, such as a decree in a partnership or partition suit (3). Though an appeal was allowed against a portion of a decision, yet there should, it was held, be a decision relating to the disposal of the entire suit (4). The words "or from any part" have been now omitted.

"Courts authorized to hear appeals"—See the various Civil Courts Acts, and in Act XII of 1887, sects 20, 21, sect 55, Indian Divorce Act (IV of 1869) (5). As to Admiralty jurisdiction, see note (6).

The subject matter of an appeal should be valued (7) for the purpose of jurisdiction, according to the law in force at the date of the appeal and not of the suit which led to it (8). Where a plaintiff definitely fixes a certain sum as the amount of his claim, this must be considered as the value of the original suit and the appeal will lie accordingly, but where he fixes a certain sum as the amount of his claim only approximately or tentatively, and prays that the amount of his claim may be ascertained in the course of the suit, then the amount found by the Court to be due to him must be regarded as the value of the original suit for the purpose of determining the forum of appeal (9).

Ex-parte decree (clause 2)—The clause allowing appeals from ex parte decrees was added by sect 45, Act VII of 1888, previous to which Act it was doubted whether an appeal was given in such cases (10).

In Jonardan v Ramdhane, (11) the Calcutta High Court said that "when a decree is passed ex parte against a defendant, a remedy by appeal is now always open to him by sect 510 of the Code as amended by Act VII of 1888 But such a remedy can be efficacious only in those cases, and their number must be small, in which the ex parte decree is either wrong in law on the face of the proceeding or is based upon evidence so weak that even though un rebutted it is insufficient to sustain the decree. In the great majority of cases in which a defendant having a good defence has had an ex parte decree passed against him, the disadvantage he labours under is that he has not been able to substantiate his defence by evidence before the Court. Upon the record, as it stands, the ex parte decree may be unassailable, but if the defendant has an opportunity (which he was prevented from having owing to some sufficient cause) of placing on the record evidence which he could have adduced to substantiate his defence, no such decree should have been passed. The remedy in such a case cannot be by way of appeal, which must ordinarily proceed upon the record as it stands. The proper remedy must be the one provided by sect. 108 of the Code." In Sadhu Krishna Ayyar & Kuppan (1) however, Sir Arnold White, C J, said that these observations were merely obiter, and he added "they seem to me to involve the reading into the Code of a great deal which the Legislature might have said but did not say. I think it must be taken that the Legislature by accident or design has given a right of appeal apart from the merits, against an order on the ground that the defendant was not in default in failing to appear and against an ex parte decree, also apart from the merits upon the same grounds. There is a power to remand a case when the Appellate Court reverses an order refusing to set aside an ex parte decree, and it seems to me anomalous to hold that there is no such power when the Appellate Court allows an appeal against a decree upon the ground that there ought not to have been an ex parte decree against the defendant" (2). In this case it was held by the full Bench that when a suit is decided ex parte an Appellate Court, to which the appeal from the decree is preferred under sect. 510 of the former Code, had jurisdiction to reverse the decree of the lower Court on the ground that such Court was wrong in proceeding to decide the suit ex parte and remand the suit for re-hearing (3).

Appeal as to costs—See notes to sect. 35, which deals with the general power to award costs.

Consent decree (clause 3)—No appeal lies from such a decree. A consent decree cannot be set aside by appeal or by motion (4). In setting aside such a decree there are two available modes of procedure (a) by a suit (b) by an application for a review of the judgment sought to be set aside. But the more proper mode is by an application for review (5).

Who may appeal—In the first place, whatever may be a party's rights under the general law, he may forego them and debar himself, or be estopped from asserting them. If, therefore, an appellant agrees not to appeal, he cannot do so (1). A party, it has been held, may also otherwise be barred from appealing. Thus, where a decree was obtained against A and others, and A not appealing, the decree was set aside and the case remanded on the appeal of the co-defendants but re-affirmed by the first Court it was held that A could not appeal from the last decree (2). In the under-mentioned case (3) however, a suit having been decided by the first Court after an intervenor had been made a party, it was remanded for trial on the appeal of the intervenor whose name was ordered to be expunged from the record. The suit was decided again in favour of the plaintiff, but the decision was reversed on appeal. It was held that the fact of the defendant having in the first instance allowed the intervenor alone to appeal, did not debar him, after the case was reopened by remand, from appealing in his own person.

Chapter XLI of the last Code treated of appeals from original decrees, and Chapter XLII in the same Code of appeals from appellate decrees. It is provided that an appeal shall be from such decrees generally. It is not expressly said by whom an appeal may be preferred, but it may reasonably be assumed that any party to the suit in which a decree is passed may, if dissatisfied with it, appeal from it. O. XLI r. 33 refers to the judgment in appeal from original decrees, and enacts that it may be for confirming, varying or reversing the decree against which the appeal is made, and applies under sect. 108 to judgments in appeal from appellate decrees. Hence, also, it is inferrible that the parties who are allowed to appeal are those who desire that a decree should be varied or reversed (4).

But a pro forma defendant against whom no judgment has been given has no right to appeal, even if another party has been found to be the owner of the land, inasmuch as such finding carries with it no legal consequence as against him (5). So in the under-mentioned case (6) it was held that the tenant had no reason to object to a decree, which was altogether in his favour, and it was not competent to him to present in appeal from the finding on an issue. Even in the case of findings inserted in the decree it is not necessary to appeal

if the findings be on issues which are not necessary for the decision of the suit in which they are raised (1)

Assuming there is otherwise no bar, the question as to who may appeal is determinable by the common sense consideration that there can be no appeal when there is nothing to appeal about. A person, therefore, who is no party (2) to the suit in which a decision is given can, as the decree does not affect him, have no ground to appeal therefrom. The person appealing must also have been a party when the decree was passed. Thus a person was once made a party to a suit, but the decree was set aside, the suit is against him dismissed, and the case remanded for trial. From this last decision he appealed, but the Court ordered the appeal to be struck off as made by a person no longer a party to the suit (3). A party, however, to the suit when the decree is passed, or when they have been brought on the record, his representative (4) or assignee (5), may appeal regarding their own rights invaded by the decree (6).

Ordinarily only the party against whom a decree is passed, that is the person ordinarily injuriously affected by the decree, can appeal. For the same reason a person against whom a suit has been dismissed usually cannot appeal against the decree, as he is not affected otherwise than beneficially by it. But in some cases a suit may be dismissed as against a defendant and yet the latter may have a right of appeal. It is not because a suit is formally dismissed that no appeal lies but because such dismissal is ordinarily not merely no grievance but an actual benefit to the defendant. There is nothing to complain of. If however, a party is aggrieved (7) by a decree then notwithstanding that the suit is dismissed against him he may appeal.

I am now quite ready to accept the principle that an appellant must be aggrieved by the

The general question whether successful defendants in a suit can appeal from the decree in their favour has been raised in several cases, though under different circumstances. In the first of the last-mentioned cases, which was one in which the defendants had no contention inter se, but on the contrary a common interest against the plaintiff who was the respondent in the appeal, it was held that as the appellants had no ground of complaint, and as the appeal was against a decree wholly in their own favour, the legal meaning of which was that the plaintiff's suit altogether failed, there was no appeal (1). In the under mentioned case (2) the plaintiff's suit had been dismissed. The defendant appellants did not desire that the decree dismissing the suit should be varied or reversed. The attempted appeal, which was disallowed, was by one defendant against another, the matter in issue being the authenticity and validity of a deed of conditional sale purporting to have been executed by one defendant as vendor in favour of the other as vendee. So again a party cannot appeal to protect a possession which he has disclaimed to hold except on behalf of another party whom he is not authorized to represent and who has not appealed (3). In such case he is not interested either on his or on such other party's behalf (4). Inasmuch as an appeal lies from the decree and not from the judgment, (5) therefore a party cannot appeal from a decree which is altogether in his favour simply because there may be findings or expressions in the judgment which may be prejudicial to him (6). In a suit for rent in which the only real issue was whether one X was or was not liable for rent, and in which Y the alleged purchaser of the tenure was held to have been wrongly made a party on the application of the tenant, it was held that Y had no right to appeal against a decree given against X praying for a declaration of her (Y's) liability for rent as purchaser from the tenant (7). On the other hand, an appeal has been held to lie by defendants against whom specifically no decree was made, but whose defence to the suit was necessarily disposed of by the decree (1) In order to see what the decree really means, the Court may look not only into the judgment but into the pleadings If the decree, although apparently, and so far as it goes, favourable to the defendants, is yet imperfect and not self explanatory, and when read by the light of the record really unfavourable and may prove injurious to them, then the defendants, being aggrieved by it and having every interest to appeal, may do so (2) In short, any person who being party to proceedings is injuriously affected by a decree passed therein is entitled to appeal (3) And if this be shown, it is immaterial that the suit may have been dismissed as against him

Ordinarily a case is decided upon issues between the plaintiffs on the one side and the defendants on the other Thus a defendant, whether interested or pro forma only, cannot appeal against a co defendant (4) unless the Court has dealt with the case at the hearing as raising not only a question between the plaintiff and defendants but also as between the defendants, in which case one of the defendants can appeal against the decree as between himself and the other defendant (5) When the decree of the Lower Court proceeds on a ground common to all defendants the Appellate Court may, on appeal by one of the defendants against the whole decree, reverse the decree in so far as it affects the other defendants though they have not joined in the appeal (6)

Preliminary decrees—A decree according to the definition in sect 2 may be either preliminary or final. And an appeal lies against a preliminary decree. It was, however, a matter of debate under the former Code whether in an appeal against the final decree, it was open to the appellant to question the correctness of the preliminary decree when no appeal had been preferred against it within the time allowed (1). The Legislature has now determined the question in the negative by this section. The object of this section is to prevent preliminary questions being raised in the form of an appeal after the case has been decided on its merits (2). But an aggrieved party can only appeal if a decree is extant in a formal shape (3). Although there may be a preliminary finding, yet unless a formal decree is drawn up, there is no possibility of the appeal here contemplated (4). There is no provision enabling an Appellate Court to dismiss an appeal against a preliminary decree on the ground that a final decree has opinion on a point of law, they may state the point of law upon which they differ, and the appeal shall then be heard upon that point only by one or more of the other Judges, and such point shall be decided according to the opinion of the majority (if any) of the Judges who have heard the appeal, including those who first heard it.

Procedure on difference of opinion.—The result of this provision is as follows —Where the Judges differ, but not on any question of law, there can be no reference and the decree is affirmed (1) But there is an appeal under the Letters Patent (vide post) If the difference is on a point of law, then the Judges may or may not (2) refer the point of law. In the case of reference the judgment on the point referred is according to the majority of the Judges who first heard the appeal and the third Judge, and in the second case (that is, where there is no reference under this section) there is an appeal under the Letters Patent The effect of this section is to supersede the provision in the Letters Patent that in the case of disagreement the judgment of the senior Judge shall prevail, (3) a provision which is still in force as regards Letters Patent appeals, (4) but it does not take away the right of appeal Therefore when the judgment of a Lower Court has been confirmed under this section by reason of one of the Judges of the Appellate Court agreeing upon the facts with the Court below, an appeal will lie against such judgment under the Letters Patent, notwithstanding the terms of this section (5) When the Judges of a Division Bench have concurred in a final decree, the fact that they differed on one point is no ground for an appeal under the Letters Patent (6) It was also held that where the Judge to whom an appeal was referred, concurred with one of the differing Judges as to the decree to be passed, but did not agree with him as to the reasons therefor, there was no further appeal to the High Court under clause (15) of the Letters Patent (7) See now as to amendment next paragraph but one Sect 617 of the Code of 1877 was held to extend sect 575 of that Code (which on the face

Preliminary decrees—A decree according to the definition in sect 2 may be either preliminary or final. And an appeal lies against a preliminary decree. It was, however, a matter of debate under the former Code whether in an appeal against the final decree, it was open to the appellant to question the correctness of the preliminary decree when no appeal had been preferred against it within the time allowed (1). The Legislature has now determined the question in the negative by this section. The object of this section is to prevent preliminary questions being raised in the form of an appeal after the case has been decided on its merits (2). But an aggrieved party can only appeal if a decree is extant in a formal shape (3). Although there may be a preliminary finding, yet unless a formal decree is drawn up, there is no possibility of the appeal here contemplated (4). There is no provision enabling an Appellate Court to dismiss an appeal against a preliminary decree on the ground that a final decree has been passed while that appeal was pending (5).

Where in a suit for accounts the first Court recorded findings on preliminary issues and ordered accounts to be taken on their basis, but drew up no preliminary decree, and a Commissioner took the accounts, and on his report the suit was dismissed, it was held that under this section plaintiff was not barred from appealing and now objecting to the preliminary findings, it was held also that no party or pleader is bound to move the Court to draw a decree, and omission to do so cannot affect the right of appeal (6).

"Save where otherwise expressly provided."—The right of appeal is a substantive right of a very valuable nature, and the presumption is against the taking away of a substantive right of such a nature by mere implication, and where the Legislature wants to take it away it will do so expressly. Calcutta High Court (1) A special appeal on the grounds given in sect. 100 lies to the High Court from the decision of the Civil Judge at Vinchur (2) When the lower Appellate Court passes separate decrees in appeals relating to the same matter between the same parties, against the same person, separate second appeals must be filed, though the decision in one second appeal will govern the rest (3)

Scope of second appeal.—The grounds upon which a second appeal lies and the cases in which it is open to the High Court to interfere with the judgment of the lower Appellate Court, are those set out in sect. 100, and sect. 101 expressly enacts that no second appeal shall lie except on the grounds mentioned in the former section. The Privy Council have, in more than one case, pointed out the necessity of adhering strictly to the provisions of those sections (4) And no Court in India or elsewhere has power to add to or enlarge those grounds (5) No second appeal lies against a finding of fact. If the High Court goes through a case as a regular appeal it exceeds the statutory limits of its jurisdiction. It has no power to entertain a case except as an appeal from an appellate decree on the grounds stated in sect. 100, which deprives them of the right to review findings of fact unless these are vitiated with one or other of the errors or defects stated in this section (6) The limitation to the power of Courts in a second appeal ought to be attended to and strictly followed, and the appellant ought not to be allowed to question the finding of the first Appellate Court upon a matter of fact (7) It cannot detract from the weight of concurrent findings of fact, that different Courts, in arriving at the same result upon the same evidence, have not been influenced by precisely the same considerations. A difference of opinion to that extent is only calculated to suggest that the evidence, whatever view be taken of it, must necessarily lead to one and the same inference (8) The consent of parties will not give the High Court a jurisdiction which it does not otherwise possess, (9) so the High Court, even with the consent of the parties, cannot pronounce a decree on the facts in a special appeal (10) On second appeal the High Court have no power to deal with the sufficiency of evidence, they have only a right to entertain questions of law. Their duty being thus confined, it seems that when evidence has been wrongly admitted by the Court below the High Courts have, generally speaking, no right to decide whether the remaining evidence in the case other than that which has been improperly admitted is sufficient to warrant the finding of the Court below. This question of sufficiency of evidence cannot be decided without examining in detail that other evidence and determining as a question of fact, whether it is sufficient of itself to warrant the lower Court's finding (1).

In a special appeal, the general affirmation of a judgment below can only be on the points raised by the special appellant. By rejecting a special appeal it does not follow that the High Court necessarily affirms all the other findings of fact or of law which the lower Appellate Court may incidentally come to (2).

If the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court contain findings which, though immaterial to the decision of the case and unnecessary for the Judge to decide, yet, as they form part of the judgment and decree might give rise to the application of the doctrine of res judicata, the High Court on second appeal, may order that such findings shall be expunged from the record (3). There is no general rule that in every case when evidence is taken on a question of fact the parties are entitled to the decision of two Courts. Therefore when additional evidence is taken by the lower Appellate Court, the High Court cannot go into the facts as in the case of a first appeal (4).

The Code provides for the manner in which the judgments of Courts are to be revised and corrected and there is no other lawful mode by which decrees of Courts can be reviewed. Thus where a Court of Appeal directed a remand for a particular purpose, namely, to try the plea of payment, the Court of remand, it was held, should try that plea only and had no authority to try any other plea, if the Court proceeded to hear and determine the whole case over again, the decree passed by it should be revised except as to the plea referred to on remand (5). A remand order conclusively determines the points of law involved in it, and these cannot be questioned on second appeal (6). The High Court in special appeal may reverse the finding of the lower Appellate Court instead of remanding the case when it is found that the lower Appellate Court had not in any way disaffirmed the findings of the lower Court (7). If the facts found by the lower Appellate Court are sufficient to enable the High Court to apply any principle of law to the appeal before them, then they may dispose of the case without any remand, (1) but it was formerly held that if the lower Appellate Court omitted to record any finding upon a material part of the case, the second Appellate Court were not at liberty to draw any inference of fact from the evidence in the case, and should remand the case for retrial (2) But see the new sect 103, post (3)

The above observations as to the limitation on the power to deal with facts must now be read subject to the new provisions contained in sect 103, post.

In adjudicating on issues of fact the first process is to determine as to their existence or non existence In order to determine such an issue, inferences are necessarily drawn from other facts as to the existence or non existence of facts in issue Such inferences and the conclusions to which they lead are inferences and findings of fact

An erroneous finding of fact is not an error or defect in procedure, though, as hereinafter pointed out, the Court may in adjudicating on facts vitiate its conclusions by errors of law and procedure A simple finding of fact, however erroneous or unsatisfactory it may be, is not the subject of second appeal There is no jurisdiction to entertain such an appeal on the ground of an erroneous finding of fact however gross or inexcusable the error may seem to be Where there is no error or defect in the procedure, the finding of the first Appellate Court upon a question of fact is final, if that Court had before it evidence proper for its consideration in support of the finding (4)

There are however, decisions which held that if the judgment is not based upon the whole evidence upon the records, and the Judge does not take into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case then, there is an error in procedure, (5) as also where the Judge had erroneously assumed a fact to exist which does not exist—as where a Judge came to a conclusion on the assumption that a document had not been filed whereas it was on the record,(1) or believes there is no evidence of a fact when there is,(2) or proceeds upon a misconception of the facts proved,(3) or bases his judgment on evidence which is not on the record (4)

The last four cases of misconception offer no difficulty. This cannot, however, be said as to the first case. There is no doubt as to the principle, that in judging on the facts the Court must consider all of them, otherwise there is not a proper procedure in investigation. The difficulty, however, is in establishing its violation by showing in any particular case that a fact has not been considered even where it may not have been expressly mentioned in the Judgment. If the fact was present to the Judge's mind, but he has either not given it weight, or the degree of weight which it is alleged he should have done, it is sometimes loosely said that the fact has not been considered. But this case is to be distinguished from those above mentioned, and is really tantamount to an appeal as to fact. The line distinguishing the two classes of cases is not infrequently a narrow one and has perhaps in some cases been overpassed.

In, however, the actual determination of fact there may be error of law. The High Court may consider whether the procedure adopted by the lower Appellate Court in dealing with the facts is proper or not (5). Thus its conclusion may be come to in the absence of all evidence,(6) or be based on what is not legal evidence,(1) or on facts to the exclusion of other facts rejected but admissible,(2) or on personal knowledge of the Judge,(3) or if there be admissible evidence the Court may err in law in its mode of dealing with it. In such case if the dealing involves the misapplication of principles of law such erroneous mode vitiates the conclusion of fact which follows it (4) So the Court may decide the facts upon a wrong view as to the onus of proof,(5) and deal improperly with the presumptions which the law raises,(6) or may dispose of a suit on a case not raised by the parties,(7) or upon irrelevant matters or issues,(8) or omit to consider evidence on the ground that the fact to be proved ought to be proved by evidence of another kind than that produced,(1) or misdirect itself as to the nature of proof required by law, as for instance in regard to the elements of a custom which has the force of law,(2) or misapprehend the real issue to be determined (3) and the legal position of the parties (4)

Further, if it be assumed that no error of law has been committed in the mode of dealing with the facts, that is in determining their existence or non-existence, from the facts so found inferences may be drawn as to the existence of certain matters which are the subject of legal definition. In such a case there is a legal inference from the facts found. Though the finding of fact cannot be questioned, an appeal Court may accept the finding of fact and question the accuracy of the legal inferences therefrom, for this is a matter of law and not of fact. The soundness of conclusions involving matter of law may be questioned (5). In such a case it is not any fact which is in question, but the soundness of the conclusions of law drawn from those facts. Thus upon the question whether there is a binding agreement a Court may find certain facts and go on to hold upon those facts that they constitute in law an acceptance of the agreement. The finding as to the facts which are the basis of the inference cannot be questioned though the inference, being a legal inference on the facts found, may be (6). If the legal conclusion derived from the facts found is not consistent with settled principles of law, there is an error of law (7). So acquiescence is not a question of fact but of legal inference from the facts found, (8) and so is estoppel, (9) and the question of the proper custody of documents, (10) though whether it is credible whether documents were in a particular custody or whether the facts rebut the presumption of authenticity are questions of fact (11). Construction of a document involves both the meaning of the words and their legal effect, or the effect which is to be given to them. The first is a question of fact and the second of law (1) Misconstruction of a document which is the foundation of a suit is ground for appeal (2) The question whether possession is adverse or not is often one of simple fact, but it may also be a conclusion of law or a mixed question (3)

So again on the question of good faith a finding that certain vendors intended by a transfer to defeat their creditors and that their transferee was aware of an impending execution against them are as findings of facts conclusive. But the conclusion drawn therefrom that the purchase was not in good faith is an inference of law which is capable of correction in appeal (4) So though a Court of second appeal must accept the facts as found, the conclusion to be drawn whether, assuming such facts to be true, a sale did or did not bind persons is a matter with which it is free to deal (5) A notice to quit must be reasonable, and thus is a question of fact, but it is a question of law whether there is evidence on which the Court can properly arrive at the conclusion of fact (6) So a conclusion from the fact of one person carrying on business and appearing to be the only partner that there could be no other partner was held erroneous as amounting to an assertion that in no case could there be a dormant partner (7) Where an Appellate Court had found that a grant of pasture-land held under the special law relating to land tenure in Kumaun was inconsistent with the general wishes and well being of the village community it was held that this was a finding of fact and not to be disturbed by second appeal (8)

Lastly, the finding may not be conclusive because of the absence of reasons for it which are required to constitute a legal judgment (9) But the Court has refused to interfere simply because the Judge did not remark upon every portion of the evidence that he excluded from his consideration, (1) as also where the judgment was sufficiently intelligible to enable the High Court to deal with the case (2)

Where a Judge states as a fact that an admission was made before him by one of the parties to the suit, the High Court cannot in special appeal inquire whether the Judge was right or wrong in making that statement. If he is wrong, the aggrieved party's remedy is by a review of judgment in the Court below and not by special appeal to the High Court. If the Judge erred in supposing the alleged admission to have been made, the party's proper course is at once to bring the error to the notice of the Judge and to apply for a review of his judgment. If he does not do so, the High Court cannot, it was said, assist him in special appeal (3)

"Contrary to law"—The words of the last Code were "some specified" law which term was held to mean specified in the memorandum of appeal and was not limited to specified statute law. The present section omits the word "specified" as being redundant. And now, as heretofore, law is not to be limited in its meaning to statute law (6). This clause generally applies where the Court wrongly applies the law to facts correctly (that is without error or defect in the procedure) found (7), or fails to apply or refuses (8) to apply the law to the case, though of course there may be cases falling within more than one or all of the clauses. A pure point of law which does not depend upon evidence may be dealt with by the Court of Appeal, though no issue was raised as regards it (9). Objection as to the necessity of notice to quit may be taken in second appeal (1) There is no appeal upon the question of the credibility of witnesses when the lower Court's views are based upon inferences from the facts proved or appearing, whether the reasons given be right or wrong (2) While the misconstruction of a document, the foundation of a suit, is a ground of appeal, there is none because some portion of the evidence may be in writing and the Judge makes a mistake as to the meaning of or effect to be given to it, (3) nor is there properly such a thing as the construction of a deposition of a witness. The word as so used means what the Court thinks is proved by it, and there is no appeal on this point (4) A misreading or misconception of the evidence is no ground for interference in second appeal (5) The bona fides of the parties is a question of fact (6) A special appeal does not lie because some portion of the evidence may be in writing and the Judge makes a mistake as to the meaning of it. For instance, a writing supposed to contain an admission may be put in as part of the evidence, but a mistake in its meaning is not a misconstruction of a document upon which a special appeal will lie if it is connected with other evidence affecting its construction. The misconstruction of a document which is the foundation of a suit, and which is in the nature of a contract or a document of title is a ground of a second appeal (7) But to discredit witnesses merely for general reasons not affecting the particular credit of any individual deponent is to commit an error of law which can be subject of a special appeal (8) Thus where the evidence for the plaintiff was disbelieved because his witness was a relative of his, there was (it was held) an error of law based upon a total misconception of the position of the plaintiff's lessor and substantially affecting the decision of the case on

Discretion when used by a Court must be judicial and not arbitrary, and where a lower Appellate Court has exercised its discretion in a sound and reasonable way, after a careful consideration of the facts, and not arbitrarily, the second Appellate Court has no power to interfere (5) But the discretion of a Court is liable to review or appeal where it is not judicial but arbitrary and perverse, caused by caprice or prejudice, or where the discretion is exercised without any proper legal material to support it (6) It has been held that there may be the exercise of so bad a discretion as to amount to an irregularity in law, and on this ground the High Court has looked into the grounds upon which the Lower Appellate Court has admitted an appeal after the lapse of the period allowed by the Limitation Act (7) But probably the correct rule in such a case or its converse is that the High Court will not interfere if the discretion is judicially exercised, even though the course ultimately adopted be not that which the High Court itself would have taken (8)

The following have been considered matters of discretion —Refusal to summon plaintiff at instance of defendant, (9) passing further orders in regard to plaintiff who disregards Court's summons to attend, (10) refusal to add parties, (11) disallowing additional evidence, (12) or interest, (13) directing

"Or to some usage."—Usage having the force of "law" means a local or family usage as distinguished from the general law (9) A finding upon the evidence on a question of custom is one of fact (10) The right of user is substantively a question of fact to be determined upon the evidence furnished by the litigants If the Lower Appellate Court has not made any error of law in drawing an inference from the evidence produced to support such a right, then the High Court in second appeal will not interfere (11) A local usage or custom being in its nature such as might necessarily affect not only parties to the particular litigation and their privies, but whole bodies of people, stands on a footing similar to a matter of law derived from other sources than usage. So, though this section disallows a second appeal with reference to findings of fact, yet the existence or non existence of a usage having the force of law is unaffected by such disallowance Consequently it is the duty of the High Court, when it has to pronounce upon that question, to examine evidence bearing upon it, not only as to the sufficiency thereof to establish all the elements (antiquity, uniformity, etc) required to constitute a valid usage having the force of law, but also the credibility of the evidence relied on and the weight due to it (12) Whether or not a custom exists, is a question of fact. But if the Lower Appellate Court has acted upon illegal evidence or has come to a decision upon evidence as to the custom which is legally insufficient to establish a custom, the High Court can treat the question as one of law. Again, if it appeared that the Lower Appellate Court has clearly from its judgment disregarded legal evidence, the Court can interfere. But the High Court in second appeal is not bound to examine and consider the evidence in all cases when the existence or non existence of an alleged custom is the sole question at issue (1).

“Failed to determine some material issue”—As to failure to determine a material issue, see cases noted (2). The Lower Appellate Court, if it does not accept, must displace the findings arrived at by the first Court (3).

It is impossible to lay down any general rule as to when the Court should consider that the reasons for a particular finding by the Lower Appellate Court must be stated. There may be many cases in which the omission to state the reasons would render the judgment so unintelligible that the Court, in second appeal, could not pronounce any opinion upon whether it was right in law. In such a case a Court would no doubt require the reasons to be stated. But there may be cases in which the Court would not think it necessary to require them and the case will not be sent back. It is not the law that when ever the Judge of an Appellate Court thinks that one set of witnesses is trustworthy, he is bound to give his reasons for it (4). Where the Lower Appellate Court fully adopts the reasoning and the conclusions of the first Court, it is not bound to set out the reasons for its decision with the same fulness as if it was deciding the case in the Court of first instance or as if it was reversing the judgment below. It may supply some additional reasons, but the insufficiency of these additional reasons, or the absence of any, would not justify a second appeal (5). When a person has put forward his defence in a general way and allowed an issue to be framed upon it which has been found against him in the Lower Appellate Court, he will not be allowed to say, in special appeal, “here is a question of fact which the Courts below have not

"Upon the merits"—This is one of several provisions in which the Legislature has indicated its intention that substantial justice and not technicality is to be looked to. An error in procedure which does not affect the decision of the case on the merits will not confer a right of second appeal (1). This is a matter which must be determined in each case according to its circumstances. In sect 372 (Act VIII of 1859) the word "possibly" did not occur. It ran as follows "which may have produced error or defect," and the word "may" was construed not to imply "may by some possibility" but "may not improbably". It was for the High Court Judges to exercise their discretion in determining whether there was such a probability, whether there had been a fair and sufficient trial, and whether litigation had reached a stage at which it ought to cease or not. The word "possibly" was accordingly introduced, (2) which avoided any necessity for the consideration of the evidence.

Ex parte appellate decree—A respondent in whose absence an appeal has been heard ex parte and against whom judgment has been given, may prefer a second appeal from the decree under this section, and his remedy is not limited to an application under O XLI 1 & 2 to the Court which passed the decree to rehear the appeal (3). The objection that the first Court did not make sufficient inquiry before admitting an application for rehearing and setting aside a former ex parte decree in favour of the plaintiff and dismissing the plaintiff's suit should be taken in the lower Appellate Court, and if it is not taken there it can not be raised in second appeal, because it would not be doing justice to restore an ex parte decree which the lower Courts have, on a subsequent trial on the merits, found should not be renewed. If the objection was a substantial one it should have been raised before the lower Court at the proper time (4).

Scope of appeal—The general rule on this point may be stated to be that it must coincide with that of the appeal before the Lower Appellate Court, as the latter should be limited to the case made in the Court of first instance. Throughout the litigation the same ground of attack and (save as mentioned) of defence should be put forward. A plaintiff appellant will not be allowed to present his case in an entirely new shape and raising fresh issues to fall back upon a new and different title or cause of action from that first asserted (1).

A case is not to be decided in special appeal upon a question which was not raised or tried or considered by the lower Courts. Parties must not be allowed to come before the High Court in special appeal and raise a question or take an objection which, if raised or taken in the first Court or even in the Appellate Court, might have been met in those Courts by adopting a course which cannot be adopted when the case comes before the High Court in special appeal (2). But where there was sufficient reason for the question not having been raised in the lower Courts the case may be remanded in second appeal with a view to have that question determined (3). An appellant is not entitled to raise a question of fraud which was not alleged in the written statement and as to which no issue was raised in the original Court (4). Where a specific title has been alleged but not proved and the plaintiff endeavours to succeed in the first Court or second Court of appeal upon a title by twelve years' adverse possession, he must be prepared to show that this other title by twelve years' adverse possession was raised in the Court of first instance with sufficient clearness to enable his adversary to understand that he claimed to succeed as well by twelve years' adverse possession as by the specific

(13) Kuppa Gura Kali Dorasami, 6 M 76, 78 (1882) In Joytara Das v Ruy Chunder, 1 W R 116 (1864) the objection as to the invalidity of the adoption was not taken in the grounds of appeal, nor in R 3

A defendant may estop himself from setting up a defence. So a defendant has not been allowed to change the whole nature of his defence at the last moment and to set up in appeal a plea which he has directly and fraudulently repudiated in the Court below (10). So a party who waives an objection to the use of depositions taken in a former litigation cannot object in appeal that the witnesses should have been called and examined (1) Parties who allow a suit to be conducted in the lower Courts as if a certain fact was admitted cannot afterwards in special appeal question it and recede from the tacit understanding (2) And if any irregularity has been committed at the instance of an appellant or with his consent he has no just ground of complaint in appeal (3)

The not taking or pressing an objection in the lower Court may not only satisfy the Court that the parties did not intend to take it as they knew there was nothing in it, (4) but may also act, where facts are involved, by way of estoppel. For had the objection been taken it might have been met. On the same principle an objection for the first time in appeal that the plaint did not ask for further relief has been disallowed, for if taken the plaint might have been amended and may be amended in appeal (5). An objection will not be allowed which, if taken at the proper time, might have been removed (6). On this principle, if secondary evidence is admitted without objection, the Court of Appeal will not entertain an objection that primary evidence should have been given (7). In the case of alleged irregularity it is a safe maxim for a Court of Appeal to be governed by, that an objection, which, if taken, might have been cured, and which was not taken in the Court below, shall not be taken in the Court of Appeal (8). An appellant will not be allowed to raise in the Court of Appeal a point which he did not raise in the Court below, even though there is some evidence in support of it, if the nature of that evidence is such that by any possibility, the respondent might have been able to rebut it if the point had been raised originally (9).

If an appellant in a second appeal was contented, and by his conduct he shows that he elects to take his chance of having the decree of the first Court confirmed on appeal on the evidence before the Court, he cannot be heard afterwards to complain in second appeal that there was a material irregularity in the conduct of the case, on the ground that all his evidence was not before the appeal Court which reversed the first decree. It is his business to have brought to the notice of the lower Appellate Court that all his witnesses were not examined before the first Court, and not having done so, he cannot in second appeal, take the objection in order to have the chance of a second trial (10). Such objection, if not raised in the Court below, and if it appears that no application was made to have the witnesses examined the Court of second appeal will not entertain (1) And if the first Court declaring itself to be satisfied with the evidence of any one witness, does not think it necessary to examine any further witnesses whom the plaintiff may have adduced, and the Lower Appellate Court, on appeal not being satisfied with the evidence of that witness, dismisses the whole suit, the High Court on second appeal may send the case back for the examination of witnesses whom the Lower Appellate Court may think fit to examine The fact that the first Court did not think it necessary to examine other witnesses may be brought to the notice of the Lower Appellate Court by the party concerned, or it may appear in the judgment of the first Court (2) If the Court of first instance, being satisfied that the plaintiff's case could not be established, refuses to examine defendant's witnesses and dismisses the suit, but the Lower Appellate Court, differing from the first Court, gives the plaintiff a decree, the objection that the proceedings before the first Court were irregular should be taken before the Lower Appellate Court, and if it is not taken there the Appellate Court in second appeal will not entertain it (3)

The second Appellate Court is not the Court in which errors of procedure of the Court of first instance are to be remedied where the error has not been made the ground of complaint in the lower Court and the first Court of Appeal Thus where any real grievance or other just cause of complaint arises to a plaintiff from the first Court's refusal to examine his witnesses it is his first duty to bring the matter prominently to the notice of the Lower Appellate Court in his grounds of appeal Failing to do so he cannot be allowed to urge it as a plea in special appeal (4) If either of the lower Courts refuses to entertain any material issue suggested by the defendant, it would afford him good ground of complaint against their proceedings But when he did not raise the issue in the lower Courts which he wants to raise in second appeal, he will not be allowed to raise it in second appeal A party will not be allowed, on special appeal, to go behind the issues by which he was content to abide in the Court below (5)

far as the Calcutta and Madras High Courts are concerned, that the interpretation to be placed on the decision of the Privy Council (1) is that this section does not touch the right of appeal given by the Letters Patent (2). These decisions consider that of the Privy Council to be of general application, and proceed upon the construction that the scheme of the Code as to appeals is that they lie from one Court to another, and that therefore this section has no application to a case where the appeal is from one Judge of a Court to the Full Court (3). As regards other sections it has been held that sect 597 (now 111) of the Code modifies sect 39 of the Letters Patent, (4) and that sect 15 of the Letters Patent is controlled by sect 629 (now O XLVII r 7) of the Code, which provides that an order of a civil Court rejecting an application for review of judgment shall be final (5).

105 (1) Save as otherwise expressly provided, no appeal shall lie from any order made by a Court in the exercise of its original or appellate jurisdiction, but, where a decree is appealed from, any error, defect or irregularity in any order, affecting the decision of the case, may be set forth as a ground of objection in the memorandum of appeal.

Other orders

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub section (1), where any party aggrieved by an order of remand made after the commencement of this Code from which an appeal lies does not appeal therefrom, he shall thereafter be precluded from disputing its correctness.

Appeal An order may or may not be a decree (see sect 2). The former are appealable as such. The latter orders may or may not be appealable under sect 104 or O XLIII r 1 which deals with what may be described as immediate appeals from orders (6). A party against whom an appealable order has been made may at once prefer his appeal. He is however not bound to do so. There is no law in India which renders it imperative upon a suitor to appeal from every interlocutory order by which he may conceive himself aggrieved under the penalty, if he does not do so of forfeiting for ever the benefit of the consideration of the Appellate Court (1) Formerly though no appeal had been filed from an order which was a preliminary decree within the period of limitation, that order might have been questioned on the appeal from the final decree (2) This, however, is not so now, see sect 97 In the case of orders not decrees, an order made under the Code from which an appeal is given under sect 104 may be questioned under this section in an appeal from the decree in the suit, although no appeal from such order has been preferred under sect 104 (3) The same rule applies where, though the order is not one of those mentioned in sect 104, it is a judgment within the meaning of sect 15 of the Letters Patent The order may equally, as in the other cases, be questioned under this section (4) It has been held that where a suit has been remanded on appeal, an appeal from the order after the suit has been taken up by the first Court on remand and finally disposed of will not lie and that this clause has no bearing on such cases (5)

the order below was right or wrong goes to the very root of the question as to the party's right to be a party to the proceedings below, or to come up at all in appeal (1) If an order is non appealable, then it may be questioned under this section subject to the terms thereof While sect 101 deals with what may be styled immediate appeals from orders, this section is in substance the grant of an ultimate appeal against any order affecting the decision of the case, but making such ultimate appeal contemporaneous with an appeal against the decree (2) It has been held that if there is an appeal against an order made under any rule, there is also an appeal against any order made under part of that rule (3)

Order must be under this Code—This section must be read with sect 104, and should be construed as if the words "under this Code" were inserted between the words "by a Court" and the words "in the exercise of" To hold otherwise would have the effect of abolishing many appeals given by other Acts of the Legislature, some of which were passed before the Code came into force, for example, appeals from decisions in Companies cases (4) So also an order for attachment for contempt is not an order in exercise of the High Court's civil jurisdiction, and therefore does not come within the provisions of this section Contempts are in the nature of offences, and therefore under sect 15 of the Letters Patent, 1865, an appeal lies from an order of committal for contempt (5)

The section contemplates two things—there being a regular appeal about something else, and in that appeal the insertion in the memorandum of appeal of a ground of objection under this section (6) This section does not enable a litigant to avoid limitation by coming up under this section when the only ground of appeal is an order made under sect 562, now O XLI r 23 (7) No appeal lies where no objection is taken to the decree as regards the merits of the case, those merits having been enquired into, (8) but the grounds are solely directed against an interlocutory order passed in the suit (9) Where, however,

(8) In Krishna Chandra Gotedar v Mohosh Chandra Laha, S A. 2310 of 1902, Cal. H. C 6 April, 1905, the Lower Appellate Court had refused to inquire into the merits because it illegally set aside an order which had been made under sect 108 restoring the suit.

(9) Sher Singh v Diwar Singh, supra (appeal against an order setting aside the dismissal of a suit for default)

the order of the lower Appellate Court as to abatement was embodied in the judgment and decree, it was held that objection thereto was properly taken by way of second appeal against the decree. In this case the Court was asked to set aside the decree on the ground that the trial on the merits was contrary to law, but even if the order that by reason of the death of one of the respondents the appeal against her failed were treated as an order in the suit separate from the findings upon which the decree was based (which it was held not to be), then there was an objection that the appeal ought to have abated altogether and not partially (1).

Order.—The words "prior to decree" which appeared in sect 363 of the Code of 1859, were omitted from the Code of 1877, as from the last and present Code, and thus the section is applicable to orders affecting the decision of the case whether such orders were made before or after the decree (2). The words "affecting the decision of the case" did not apply to "such orders" in the former section, but to the previous words "error, defect or irregularity". So in an appeal from an ex parte decree in a summary suit upon a promissory note, it was held that an appeal lay from an order made after decree under sect 534 (now O XXXVII r 4), refusing to set aside the ex parte decree (3). The Court also observed that if the Court made an order to set aside the decree, stay execution, and give leave to the defendant to appear and defend, it "affects the decision," and by refusing to do so it also "affects the decision" inasmuch as it thereby upholds the decree against the party applying to have it set aside (4). The word "such" has now been deleted. The order must be one passed under the Code. A decision under sect 5 of the Court Fees Act is not an order under this section (5).

Decree—The section only applies where there is an appeal from a "decree". As to the meaning of this term, see notes under sect 2, ante. Where the order appealed from was not a decree nor an order under sect 588 of the former Code, it was held no appeal lay (6).

Error, defect, or irregularity—These words mean in this section error, defect or irregularity in procedure or in law, and not in matters of fact (7).

"Affecting the decision of the case"—These words mean "affecting the decision of the case with reference to the merits of it" (8). Therefore when an ex parte decree was set aside by an order under sect 108 (now O IX r 13), and the suit heard upon the merits and dismissed, it was held that such order was not an order affecting the decision of the case under this section, it did not determine on the merits, but merely insured a hearing upon the merits (1) So an order readmitting an appeal which had been dismissed for default is not an order affecting the decision of the case, (2) nor is an order allowing a plaintiff to sue as a pauper (3) The orders which may be considered under this section are, in short, those by which the Judge may have been misled in deciding the case (4)

Clause (2) — See ante, notes, "Appeal"

1 106 Where an appeal from any order is allowed, it shall lie to the Court to which an appeal would lie from the decree in the suit in which such order was made, or where such order is made by a Court (not being a High Court) in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction, then to the High Court.

of misjoined suits, (1) sending for and examining an Ameen on his report, (2) power to award costs against the estate of a deceased plaintiff, (3) power to pass an order under sect 108 of the last Code, (4) and the like. An Appellate Court has wider powers of remand than under the last Code (5).

The words of the section confer and impose upon an Appellate Court very wide powers, (6) in fact, the same powers as those of the first Court as nearly as may be. It was, however, sometimes a question whether the general powers thus stated in the first part of the section were controlled by the second portion, (7) which dealt with the death, marriage and insolvency of parties. This portion has now been removed to O XXII r 13, the object of which is to obviate the necessity of repeating the provisions of the order so as to make them applicable to appeals, and that order is itself stated in wider terms, being no longer limited to proceedings arising out of the death, marriage or insolvency of parties to an appeal (8). The amended section, disencumbered of the portion referred to, should now make it clear that the powers of an Appellate Court are as nearly as may be the same as those of the first Court; that is, while they are as extensive, they are subject to the same limitations (9). This principle has been held to be applicable to all cases where the Appellate Court has a plenary, and not merely a limited, jurisdiction (10). The first sub clause is new, and has been inserted because it was thought desirable to have in the body of the Code a general provision about the powers of an Appellate Court. The second sub clause is taken from the first part of sect 582 of the former Code.

(10) Tej Mal v Papayunma 22 W L J 225 (1911).

(b) from orders made under this Code or under any special or local law in which a different procedure is not provided

"As far as may be"—These words mean "as far as is consistent with the principles on which appeals from appellate decrees [and orders] are admitted and determined." In second appeal the Court cannot go into the facts. So it was held that no objection could be taken under sect 567 of the last Code (1) corresponding with the present O XLI r 27. So also sect 565 (now r 25 of the same Order) was held not to apply to second appeals (2). So while sects 562 and 564 of the last Code were held strictly binding on all Courts of first appeal, cases frequently occurred in which the Court in second appeal remanded cases for reasons not contemplated in the former section (3). So the appellate Court has set aside a decree where there was no proper judgment and remanded the case for a decision de novo, (4) and has made a remand where evidence was improperly admitted, (5) and for a finding on an issue (6). Where the first Court dismissed a suit on one of the issues, viz that of title, observing that it was not necessary to decide the other issues, one of which was an issue as to limitation, and the second Court decreed the suit by reversing the finding of the first Court on the issue of title, but omitted to record a finding on the issue of limitation, the case was remanded to the Lower Appellate Court for findings on the remaining issues (7). And though there was no section strictly authorizing a remand, the Court was held under the circumstances warranted ex debito justitiæ in setting aside the proceedings and directing a retrial of the case (8). Sect 587 of the last Code was held to authorize an application to bring in a plaintiff respondent in second appeals and to extend to such appeals the provisions of sects 368 and 582 of that Code (now O XXII r 4, sect 107, O XXII r 11) (9). It was, however, subsequently held, though the Allahabad and Calcutta High Courts dissent, that the reference to sect 582 in the Limitation Act did not include by implication second appeals referred to in the section corresponding to this (10). This section may be read with sect 582, now 107 ante, O XXII r 11, post (11).

APPEALS TO THE KING IN COUNCIL

35] 109 Subject to such rules as may, from time to time, be made by His Majesty in Council regarding appeals from the Courts of British India, and to the provisions hereinafter contained, an appeal shall lie to His Majesty in Council—

- (a) from any decree or final order passed on appeal by a High Court or by any other Court of final appellate jurisdiction,
- (b) from any decree or final order passed by a High Court in the exercise of original civil jurisdiction, and
- (c) from any decree or order, when the case, as hereinafter provided, is certified to be a fit one for appeal to His Majesty in Council.

36] 110 In each of the cases mentioned in clauses (a) and (b) of section 109, the amount or value of the subject-matter of the suit in the Court of first instance must be ten thousand rupees or upwards, and the amount or value of the subject-matter in dispute on appeal to His Majesty in Council must be the same sum or upwards, or the decree or final order must involve, directly or indirectly, some claim or question to or respecting property of like amount or value, and where the decree or final order appealed from affirms the decision of the Court immediately below the Court passing such decree or final order, the appeal must involve some substantial question of law.

37] 111 Notwithstanding anything contained in section 103, no appeal shall lie to His Majesty in Council—

Bar of certain appeals

(b) to interfere with any rules made by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and for the time being in force, for the presentation of appeals to His Majesty in Council, or their conduct before the said Judicial Committee.

(2) Nothing herein contained applies to any matter of criminal or admiralty or vice-admiralty jurisdiction, or to appeals from orders and decrees of Prize Courts.

Appeal to His Majesty in Council.—This matter is dealt with both in the above sections and in O XLV. The provisions are substantially the same as in the last Code. Sects 613–615 of that Code have not been re-enacted, and rr. 4 and 5 of O XLV. are new.

In the Common Law of England must be found the origin of the jurisdiction of the Sovereign in Council, but the Statute Law has recognized and affirmed such jurisdiction. In 1726, by a charter granted by George I, an appeal lay in the case of the Mayors' Courts to the Governor or President in Council and in important cases (1) to the King in Council. The appeal to the Privy Council from the Court of Sudder Dewany Adawlut (which the High Court on its appellate side represents) was granted by 21 Geo III c 70. The power to admit an appeal was first conferred upon the Sudder Dewany Adawlut by Reg. XVI of 1797, sect 2 (2). In 1833 the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was created, (3) and by orders of Her Majesty in Council of the 10th April, 1838, passed in pursuance of 3 and 4 William IV c 41, certain restrictions were placed upon the exercise of the power of the Sudder Dewany Adawlut to admit an appeal. The practice of the Calcutta High Court in the admission of appeals has been regulated by rules of the Court made by the Sudder Dewany Adawlut on the 17th December, 1858, and by the High Court on the 30th July, 1870 (4). The Charter Act of 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 104) substituted the High Courts of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay for the Supreme Courts established under the Charters of 1774, 1800, and 1823 respectively. The Rules now in force have been issued under the powers vested in the High Court by 24 and 25 Vict c 104, sect 13, by the Letters Patent of the High Court, 1865, and by the Code of Civil Procedure. These Rules came into force from 1st July, 1891 (5). The right of appeal to the King in Council now rests on clause 39 of the Letters Patent of 1865, read with sects 109 and 110 of this Code, and O XLV (1). Though appeals from the High Courts in India are regulated by positive Statute, yet the Sovereign in Council possesses by virtue of the Royal Prerogative a clear appellate jurisdiction over the judgments of all Courts of Justice established in any of the British dominions beyond the seas, and notwithstanding the express statutory rights of appeal from the decisions of the High Courts, it has been repeatedly held that, notwithstanding the statutes which prescribe the time and mode of appealing and the limits in point of amount, the power of the Sovereign in Council to entertain petitions for leave to appeal where the conditions imposed by the Statute have not been complied with, remains in full force. The jurisdiction was exercised in 1862 in an appeal from Oudh, where there was no positive Statute law, Regulation or Order in Council applicable to the admission of appeals from the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh to Her Majesty in Council (2). Thus also it is quite discretionary with the Judicial Committee to admit an appeal in cases far below the appealable amount mentioned in the Statutes and long after the period prescribed by the Statute for filing a petition of appeal in India has expired. Such petitions have been admitted and have led to reversal of the judgment of the Courts below. But the High Courts have no power to allow or entertain a petition for leave to appeal, or to stay execution or to take security for costs of an appeal, except strictly in accordance with the terms of the Statute or with any order the Privy Council may make in the particular case (3). The Judicial Committee act only as advisers to the Crown and not as a Court of Judicature (4) and 'humbly recommend' their conclusions to His Majesty. But a commission appointed by the Governor General for the purpose of inquiring into the truth of an imputation against a Chief and of reporting to the Governor General in Council how far the same was true to the best of their judgment and belief was held to be a commission appointed by the Governor General himself for the information of his own mind in order that he should not act in his political and sovereign character otherwise than in accordance with the dictates of justice and equity and not in any sense a Court or if a Court not a Court from which an appeal lay to His Majesty in Council (5). Nor is there any appeal to His Majesty in Council from the Courts of Assistant Political Agents. Political Agents in Kathua war or from the decision of the Governor of Bombay in Council (6). By the terms of the Charter (and also the Code) the appeal given is confined to Judicial acts namely from decrees and orders though special leave may be granted by the Privy Council (1) Thus it has been held by the Privy Council that no appeal lies to it under the Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894) sect 51, since an award by the High Court under that Act is neither a decree under sect 2 of this Code nor a decree, final judgment or order within the meaning of the Letters Patent, but is the last of a series of arbitration proceedings (2) Where a matter has been referred by His Majesty to the Judicial Committee which is not strictly an appealable grievance, their Lordships of the Privy Council may, under the reservations contained in 3 & 4 William IV c 41 advise His Majesty to grant the petitioner leave to appeal (3) Special leave to appeal was given in a case against an order made by the Judges of the Supreme Court of Madras dismissing the Master of that Court from his office for alleged official misconduct, because the order was not made in the course of a judicial proceeding (4) But in Ex parte Robertson (5) it was held that the Judicial Committee have no jurisdiction to take into consideration the propriety of the dismissal of a public servant, who held his office during pleasure unless the matter is expressly referred to them by the Crown Following this case it has been held that the Privy Council have no jurisdiction to grant special leave to appeal against an order of the High Court at Calcutta under sect 26, clause (2) of Beng Reg V of 1831, dismissing a Munsiff for corruption in the exercise of his functions as a Judge (6)

As stated, the King in Council, by virtue of the Royal Prerogative possesses an appellate jurisdiction over the judgment of all Courts of Justice established in any of the British Dominions beyond the seas, and it is quite discretionary with the Judicial Committee to admit an appeal in cases far below the appealable amount mentioned in the Code, and long after the period prescribed for filing a petition of appeal in India has expired (7) Thus when the High Court in India has refused the necessary certificate, the aggrieved party may present a petition for the exercise of the prerogative right of the Crown to admit an appeal and the Judicial Committee in a fit case, will advise His Majesty that leave to appeal should be allowed on the usual terms as to security In a fit case their lordships will advise His Majesty to grant (8) an order staying proceedings where the High Court in India refused to make such an order on the ground that the Code gave them no jurisdiction over the subject matter pending an appeal not certified by themselves (9) As a rule in cases under the appealable amount before special leave is petitioned from His Majesty in Council an application should be made to the High Court for a certificate that the case is nevertheless a fit one for appeal (10)

Special leave, by the Privy Council, when granted.—The Privy Council will not advise His Majesty to exercise this prerogative and to give special leave to appeal unless there is some substantial question of law of general interest involved (1) The petition for special leave to appeal is not by way of appeal from the decision of the Court, but it is presented for an exercise of the prerogative right of the Crown to admit an appeal. Although it is not an appeal, it is perhaps a more convenient proceeding than an appeal because the Privy Council can then grant leave on any other ground, if other ground appears for the indulgence that is sought, and if it finds that, in a case in which the appeal is claimed as of right, the Court below has refused the certificate for a reason which appears to them to be an unsound reason, then they will advise His Majesty to admit the appeal (2) The Privy Council is not bound by the provisions of the Code. Thus where in an appeal to it by one of the defendants, it set aside a decree of the High Court and restored that of the first Court, and it appeared from the wording of the decree of the Privy Council that the defendants generally were entitled to have the benefit of the decree, held that the defendants generally were entitled to the benefit of the decree though there was no common ground such as is referred to in the Code (3)

Special leave without requiring further security—Where the High Court passed a separate decree on a cross appeal, identical in terms with those of the decree passed on appeal in the same suit, and granted leave to appeal in one and refused it in the other, their lordships granted special leave without requiring further security than had already been taken by the High Court (4)

Leave to appeal, granted without authority—special leave granted—An objection that an appeal has come before the Judicial Committee without proper authority, viz that the leave to appeal should not have been given, ought to be taken at the earliest moment, for the obvious reason that the great expense of preparing for the hearing is thereby saved, which is uselessly incurred if, when the objection is ultimately taken, the Privy Council feel obliged to yield to it, but it is clearly competent to the Judicial Committee to hear such an objection at any stage of the appeal, and it is not unfrequently heard when the appeal is called on and before the arguments on the merits have commenced (5)

Special leave to appeal—contents of the petition—Such a petition should contain a full statement of the facts and legal grounds showing that there is a substantial case on the merits, and a point of law involved proper to be determined by the Privy Council. Thus, where the statements contained in the petition were of a too general character to enable the Privy Council to judge of the propriety of granting the special leave prayed for, their lordships ordered that the petition should be either dismissed, with liberty to present another petition, or stand over to amend the petition (1) If a serious question of law is involved in the appeal, special leave will be granted by the Privy Council, though leave had been refused by the High Court (2) Special leave has been refused in the following cases —merely because the Judge had omitted to record any reason while granting a review, which he should have done, (3) and where the High Court dismissed an appeal as barred by limitation, the Judicial Committee not being satisfied that the refusal of the High Court to admit the appeal out of time was wrong (4)

Rescission of special leave to appeal—Where there is an omission of any material facts, whether it arises from improper intention on the part of the petitioner or whether it arises from accident or negligence, still the effect is just the same if the Court has been induced to make an order which, if the facts were fully before it, it would not, or might not, have been induced to make (5) So an Order in Council made upon an ex parte application granting special leave to appeal upon an allegation as to the value of the property in dispute was rescinded, where there were omissions in the petition of proceedings in the suit, which showed the true value of the property Generally an Order in Council obtained upon an ex parte petition, which omits to state the true facts, will be discharged with costs but if there has been laches in applying to discharge the order on the part of the respondent no costs will be given (6) Where special leave to appeal is granted upon a petition in which material misstatements are made, objections should be taken by the respondent by a preliminary motion to rescind the leave to appeal, or at any rate before the hearing of the appeal, when called on, has been entered on Where it is not clear that the material misstatements in the petition had been made with an intention to deceive, and the objection to the appeal is taken at a late stage of the hearing, the Judicial Committee may decline to dismiss the appeal, but refuse the appellant the costs of the appeal But if their Lordships are satisfied that the misstatements were intentionally made to deceive them, they will, even at a late stage, dismiss the appeal (7)

Powers of High Court after admission—The question has arisen and been answered affirmatively whether the High Court after the admission of an appeal to the Privy Council, has any further authority in the suit, and competence to do any judicial act relating to it Thus on the death of a party on the record of an appeal pending before the Privy Council, evidence must be given in the Court from which the appeal has been preferred of the representative character of the person or persons by or against whom review is sought The Court below should give its own opinion as to who are the parties who should be substituted upon the record, and should make and send a certificate or statement on which their Lordships can act (1) When only the petition for leave to appeal has been filed and before it is allowed, the High Court has jurisdiction to entertain applications relating to the appeal (2) Further, if the appellant has taken no steps towards prosecuting the appeal, the petition of appeal may be struck off the file by the High Court (3) The Judicial Committee have no jurisdiction to entertain any application in an appeal until the petition of appeal is lodged there, though the transcript has been registered in the Council office (4) If after the admission of the appeal no steps are taken by the appellant within reasonable time, the Judicial Committee, upon a certificate of the Registrar of the High Court that no further proceedings have been taken after the admission of the appeal, will dismiss it (5) It was considered that an appeal to the Privy Council having once been admitted, whether properly or erroneously, the High Court had no further jurisdiction to review its order and declare the appeal rejected (6) But in a later case Prinsep J, held that an order granting leave to appeal to the Privy Council was open to review (7) And an order refusing leave to appeal to the Privy Council can be reviewed by the Court which made it (8)

Rehearing of appeal by the Privy Council—It is unquestionably the strict rule, and ought to be distinctly understood as such, that no cause in the Privy Council can be reheard, and that an order once made, that is a report submitted to His Majesty and adopted, by being made an Order in Council, is final, and cannot be altered. The same is the case of the judgments of the House of Lords, that is, of the Court of Parliament, or of the King in Parliament as it is sometimes expressed, the only other supreme tribunal. Whatever, therefore, has been really determined in these Courts must stand, there being no power of rehearing for the purpose of changing the judgment pronounced. Nevertheless, if by misprision in embodying the judgments, errors have been introduced, these Courts possess, by Common Law, the same power which the Courts of Record and Statute have of rectifying the mistakes which have crept in. It is impossible to doubt that the indulgence extended in such cases, is mainly owing to the natural desire prevailing to prevent irremediable injustice being done by a Court of the last resort, where by some accident, without any blame, the party has not been heard, and an order has been inadvertently made as if the party has been heard. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case their Lordships recommended the restoration of the appeal dismissed ex parte (1). Even before report, whilst the decision of the Board is not yet res judicata, great caution has been observed in permitting the rehearing of appeals (2). After the respondent has had notice of a pending appeal, he is not entitled to further notice that the record has been transmitted or that the appeal is set down for hearing, and he cannot ask for a rehearing of the appeal on the ground that he had no such notice (3). The unusual indulgence of recommending a rehearing of an appeal to His Majesty ought never to be granted except under very special circumstances, and only where the ex parte hearing has not been occasioned by any default in the party applying for a rehearing (4). An Order in Council rescinding a previous Order in Council, granting special leave to appeal, may be discharged and the appeal restored (5). Also an appeal dismissed for want of prosecution (under Rule 5 of the Order in Council of 1853) has been restored on explanation of delay incurred and on conditions as to costs and security to be given in England (6).

Appeals from decision given on second appeal—In an appeal to the Privy Council from a decree of the High Court made on a second appeal, the hearing before their Lordships must be based upon the materials which were open to the High Court, and the findings of the Subordinate Judge on matters not involving questions of law must be taken as conclusive, (7) and in such cases the findings of fact by the first Court are binding on the Judicial Committee (8).

Concurrent judgments on fact—The Judicial Committee will not interfere with concurrent judgments of the Courts below on pure matters of fact, (9) unless very definite and explicit grounds for that interference are assigned, (1) and it is satisfied that there is miscarriage of justice or the violation of any principle of law or procedure (2) But where there are concurrent findings of facts and there is no substantial question of law in issue, their Lordships, in order to see how far the Courts have concurred in their view of the facts, will examine precisely what their findings are (3) Where the Courts in India have come to a certain conclusion on a certain issue, that is a fact which, considering the advantages the Judges in India generally possess, of forming a correct opinion of the probability of a certain transaction, and in some cases of the credit due to the witness, affords a strong presumption in favour of the correctness of their decisions, yet that circumstance does not and ought not, to relieve the Judicial Committee, the Court of last resort, from the duty of examining the whole evidence and forming for itself an opinion on the whole case (4) But the duty of a Court of ultimate appeal is to judge from the evidence and not to infer from probabilities (5) In a recent case where in a mortgage deed a fictitious entry had been made (which if correct would have brought it within the jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court), and there was no evidence that there was an error it was held by the Privy Council that concurrent findings of error were not findings of fact, since a decision that there is no evidence to support a finding is a decision of law (6)

The Judicial Committee has refused to depart from the rule as to concurrent findings of fact, merely because the High Court has admitted documents tendered by the appellant which the first Court had rejected (7) It cannot detract from the weight of concurrent findings of fact, that different Courts in arriving at the same result upon the same evidence, have not been influenced by precisely the same considerations A difference of opinion to that extent is only calculated to suggest that the evidence, whatever view be taken of it, must necessarily lead to one and the same inference, and there will be no interference by the Privy Council in such cases (8) Where no question of law, either as to the construction of documents or any other point, arises on the judgment of the High Court, and there are concurrent findings of the two Courts below on the oral and documentary evidence submitted to them, their Lordships will not entertain an appeal (9) When the question is not one of construction of one or more deeds, which would be a question of law, but is a question as to the effect to be given to decrees, leases and other documents as evidence of certain facts (eg that of adoption and its consequences), the concurrent findings against the factum of the adoption will not be disturbed merely because the evidence largely consisted of leases and other written documents (1)

The well known rule of the Judicial Committee not to disturb concurrent findings of fact by the lower Courts, unless they are shown to be erroneous, is none the less applicable, although the Courts may not have taken precisely the same view of the weight to be attached to each particular item of evidence. Thus their Lordships declined to disturb such finding where one Court relied on the oral and the other on the documentary evidence (2) In boundary cases the appellant must come prepared to show clearly where the decree appealed from is wrong, and what other course is right, it is insufficient to raise doubts as to the correctness of the decision (3)

It has been recently held that the provisions as to concurrent findings on fact would be misconstrued if the Judges in India were by implication subjected to the duty of making their narrative of circumstances minutely exhaustive, under the penalty of being presumed to have overlooked elementary considerations (4)

The Judicial Committee will not, on the ground that there was some imperfection in the pleadings set aside the decree of a High Court, when the High Court were right on the merits of the case (5) Nor will their Lordships allow any new point to be taken for the first time in the Privy Council (6)

Reversal of decree on preliminary question entry into merits — In Fischer v Kamala Nacker (7) it was arranged, in the commencement of the argument, with the consent of the counsel on both sides, that if their Lordships should be of opinion that the decision of the Court below could not be sustained on the grounds on which it had been based, they should proceed to consider the whole case on its merits, and finally dispose of it And their Lordships, being of opinion that the decision could not be sustained on the grounds on which it had been based, considered the whole case on its merits and dismissed the appeal without costs saying that as they dismissed the appeal on wholly different grounds from those relied on by the Court below the dismissal should be without costs by the Judge, the costs of appeal should be directed to be costs in the cause (1) In the case (2) cited their Lordships, while remanding the case, ordered that if the respondent failed to appear in the High Court, or if the appeal should be decided against him, the respondent should pay the appellant's costs of the appeal in England, and the costs (if any) paid under the decree of the High Court were to be repaid to him. When an appeal is heard ex parte in the absence of the respondent and it is dismissed, the respondent is entitled to costs up to, and including the lodgment of his printed case, and also to the costs of appearance for applying for the same (3)

Pauper appeal—In an early case (4) leave to appeal in forma pauperis was granted on an application to the High Court on an unstamped paper, but certified by counsel that there was reasonable ground of appeal. It has been recently held that the High Court cannot entertain an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council in forma pauperis and to be exonerated from depositing the respondent's costs and the usual fees (5). The question whether it is necessary to apply for leave to prosecute an appeal in forma pauperis in England although the Courts in India admitted such an appeal, was referred to in Munni Ram v Sheo Churn (6).

Appeal pending, effect on rights of owner—The pendency of an appeal to England does not put the party who subject to that appeal is the owner of an estate under a legal disability to bring a suit in that character against third parties (7).

Decree—This term is defined in sect 2 (2) and under that definition a decree may be either preliminary or final. The distinction between the two is pointed out in the explanation to that section. Under sect 97, parties aggrieved by preliminary decrees are required to appeal therefrom. Sect 594 of the last Code ran as follows: 'decree includes also judgment and order' (8). Decree now includes a final order. Clauses (a) and (b) of sect 595 of the last Code spoke of "final decrees". Sect 109 now speaks of any decree or final order. Apparently then, an appeal will lie from a decree which may be either final or preliminary and from an order which is final. This is in accordance with previous decisions. A final decree was always appealable. And the Privy Council held that 'final' for this purpose did not mean the last decree but a decree determining rights finally, such is a preliminary decree establishing the liability to account and directing accounts to be taken (1). In the case cited it was said that, to decide whether a decree is final or not, the Court should look at what was the real question before the Court when the decree was made. Where the plaintiff alleged that the defendant was accountable to him upon several claims, and the defendant alleged that he had got legal defences to every one of those claims and that he was not accountable at all, and the Court held that the legal defences put forward were valid as to some of the claims, and as to others of the claims they were invalid and therefore the defendant must account, and passed a decree for account, such a decree directing accounts was held to be a "final" decree under the last Code (2). "It is true," said Lord Hobhouse, "that the decree that was made does not declare in terms the liability of the defendant, but it directs accounts to be taken which he was contending ought not to be taken at all, and it must be held that the decree contains within itself an assertion that, if a balance is found against the defendant on those accounts, the defendant is bound to pay it. Therefore the form of the decree is exactly as if it affirmed the liability of the defendant to pay something on each one of these claims, if only the arithmetical result of the account should be worked out against him. Now that question of liability was the sole question in dispute at the hearing of the cause, and it is the cardinal point of the suits. The arithmetical result is only a consequence of the liability. The real question in issue was the liability, and that has been determined by this decree against the defendant in such a way that in this suit it is final. The Court can never go back again upon this decree so as to say that, though the result of the account may be against the defendant, still the defendant is not liable to pay anything. That is finally determined against him, and therefore in their Lordships' view the decree is a final one within the meaning of the Code (3).

An order of remand, where the first Court has disposed of a suit on a preliminary point, is not a final, but an interlocutory decree (4). But where a remand was made under the wrong section and the order of the High Court decided a cardinal issue in the suit, which could never, while the decision stood, be disputed again, there was held to be a final decree, notwithstanding that there might be inquiries yet to be made in disposing of the suit, e.g. where the High Court, reversing the decree of the first Court held that a valid bequest was made by a will and remanded the case for the trial of other issues (1) Where the High Court affirmed the liability of the appellant, which could never be questioned again and was the cardinal point in the suit, (2) an appeal was held to lie (3) Where a candidate at an examination for pleadership was erroneously declared by a notification in the Government Gazette to be qualified for admission as a vakil of the High Court, but when the mistake was found out the notification was cancelled, on application for leave to appeal, held that Chapter XLV of the last Code had no application, and that the matter was not one in which the High Court was concerned to give or refuse leave to appeal (4) Where, after the admission of an appeal to the Privy Council, the Court below passed a judgment on review in the same case, which judgment was sent up and notified to the Council, and put on record in the appeal case, it was held open to the Judicial Committee to pass judgment on the appeal, without prejudice to the subsequent judgment which was passed on review (5)

Final order.—As regards orders made prior to decree which are only so many steps towards the ultimate decree, they may be styled preliminary or interlocutory, and in this sense not final. By final order is apparently meant an order which terminates the proceedings in favour of one of the parties (6). In the case cited, Markby, J., said “I do not know any meaning to the word ‘final’ which can be applied to orders made subsequent to decree.” Sed quæ Such an order cannot, it is true, possess finality in the sense in which that term is opposed to orders which are steps towards the decree, for the decree has ex hypothesi been made, but the order may be final as terminating the particular proceedings in which it is made, and the final character of such orders is recognized in sect. 2 with reference to matters determined under sect. 47, ante (7). It has been held that the question of finality must be determined with reference to the precise relation in which it stands to the proceedings before the Court (8). It is not always easy to distinguish between what is a final and what is an interlocutory order. The Court of Appeal (in England) has not attempted to give an exhaustive definition, and the Legislature in the Judicature Act, 1875, sect. 12 has not given such a definition (9). Sect. 2, clause (2), Explanation, of this Code, says that a decree is final when the adjudication completely disposes of the suit. “No order, judgment, or other proceeding,” says Brett, L. J., (10) “can be final which does not at once affect the status of the parties, for whichever side the decision may be given, so that if it is given for the plaintiff it is conclusive against the defendant, and if it is given for the defendant it is conclusive against the plaintiff" "I conceive," says Fry, L J, "that an order is final only where it is made upon an application or other proceeding which must, whether such application or other proceeding fail or succeed, determine the action. Conversely, I think that an order is 'interlocutory' where it cannot be affirmed that in either event the action will be determined." When any further step is necessary to perfect an order (1) or judgment, it is not final but interlocutory (2). A judgment may be either final, or preliminary, or interlocutory, the difference between them being that a final judgment determines the whole cause or suit, and a preliminary or interlocutory judgment determines only a part of it, leaving other matters to be determined (3). An order dismissing a petition, presented under the Indian Companies Act (Act XII of 1895) for confirmation of the Judge, and directing that the proceedings be remitted to the Court of the Subordinate Judge, and that the application presented to that Court may be disposed of, is not a final order, (5) nor is an order refusing to appoint a Receiver in a suit (6). An order of a High Court setting aside an order of a lower Court refusing to set aside an ex parte decree is a purely interlocutory and not a final order, (7) and so is an order rejecting an application for stay of execution of a decree under appeal (8). An order under the Rules and Orders merely refusing to re-open a Registrar's report is not final, (9) nor is an order deciding only that the Respondent should be at liberty to sue in forma pauperis (10). But an order of the High Court based on the ground that the plaint does not disclose any cause of action against the defendant is a final order within the meaning of this clause, (11) and so is an order setting aside the decision of a lower Court as to the respective shares of the parties to a partnership suit and directing fresh accounts to be

Appeal under Letters Patent not falling within the Code— Where, by an Order in Council, a case was remitted to the High Court with a direction to take an account between the parties on certain principles, and it was further ordered that if, on the taking of the accounts, anything should be found due to the plaintiff, a decree should be made in his favour, and if nothing should be found due to him the suit would be dismissed, and when the case came back to the High Court, a Division Bench took the accounts and made a decree against the defendants, held that sects 595, 596 of the former Code did not apply to such a case, but a right of appeal to His Majesty in Council might be successfully claimed under clause 39 of the Letters Patent, the amount in dispute being over Rs 10,000, because it was a final decree of a Division Court of the High Court from which an appeal did not lie to the High Court under clause 15 of the Letters Patent. The expression "a Division Court" in sect 39 (it was held) did not apply only to a Division Court sitting on the original side (3)

"Passed on appeal."—This does not mean the same thing as any order passed in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction. So an order rejecting an application to review a judgment passed on appeal is not an order made on appeal from which an appeal lies to the Privy Council (4). Nor is an order rejecting an application to amend a decree, (5) nor is an order refusing to admit an appeal presented beyond the prescribed period (6). Two essential elements to be considered in deciding whether an order is one passed in appeal are whether the relationship of a Superior and an Inferior Court exists, and whether the Superior Court possesses the power to review, affirm or modify the decisions (7). If an order passed by the High Court in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction under sect 115 or its power of superintendence under sect 15 of the High Court Act of 1851 is made or passed on appeal within the meaning of this clause (8) (9)

"In the exercise of original civil jurisdiction."—There is no right of appeal from a decree made by the High Court in the exercise of original jurisdiction, if an appeal will lie to the High Court itself under clause 15, but there is a direct appeal from a decree made in the exercise of original jurisdiction by a Division Bench of two Judges. There is no appeal, under clause 10 of the Letters Patent, to the Privy Council from an interlocutory judgment or order of a Judge of the High Court (e.g. an order for inspection of documents), until such judgment or order has been subjected to an appeal to the High Court, under clause 15 of the Letters Patent, except in those cases, in which, by reason of the number of the Judges who have made such order, an appeal under clause 15 is given directly to the Privy Council (1). There is no appeal against the decision of a High Court passed on appeal from an award of compensation made by the Court to which reference had been made under sect. 18 of the Land Acquisition Act, for such a decision is an award (2).

"Any decree or order, when the case is certified."—The certificate is given under O XLVI r. 3 that the case is "otherwise" a fit one for appeal. This provision is intended to meet special cases where the point in dispute is of importance (3). In all cases below the appealable value to the High Court for such certificate, leave from the Privy Council itself (4). This clause includes cases where it cannot be said that the amount or value of the subject-matter of the suit is Rs 10,000 or upwards or that the amount or value of the dispute on appeal is of that sum or upwards, (5) where the amount or value of the subject-matter of the suit in the Court of first instance is below Rs 10,000, but the amount or value of the dispute on appeal is Rs 10,000 or upwards (6) and where the matter in dispute is under the appealable value. Where the certificate of the High Court simply said, "Let a certificate be granted if this is a fit case for appeal to His Majesty in Council, and let the usual notices of appeal be issued," it was held to have been given pursuant to sect. 595 (c) and the latter and operative of sect. 600 of the former Code (7). The discretion vested in the Court by this clause should be sparingly used (8). This clause is not to be interpreted as restricted to "final orders" (9).

by law had been passed, can be certified to be a fit case on the ground that the financial and commercial position of the Company may be seriously affected by the questions at issue, and also that it is of great importance to Indian Companies generally that their rights should be precisely defined on this point. The value of the question at issue between the parties, in such a case, is one to which it is impossible to give a numerical expression (1). No appeal lies from the judgment of one Judge of the High Court, or of one Judge of a Division Court, or of two or more Judges of the High Court, where they are equally divided in opinion (sect 111). But in any such case an appeal should be made in the first instance to a Division Bench of the High Court under clause 15 of the Charter, before an appeal can be preferred to His Majesty in Council (2). The question whether an applicant had established that substantial loss might result to him if execution was not stayed pending the hearing of the appeal presented to the High Court is not a question which would justify a special certificate of fitness under this clause (3). Sections 17 and 18 of the Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907) do not interfere with any right of appeal to the Privy Council (4).

Conditions imposed on right of appeal (Sect 110).—This section requires that in order to give a right of appeal there must be in dispute either directly or indirectly an amount of Rs 10,000. If the decree affirms the Court below, another condition is affirmed, namely that the appeal must involve some substantial question of law. The presence of such a question does not give a right of appeal, when the value is below the mark. The requirement of it restricts the right when the higher decree affirms the lower (5). When it is laid down that the decree must involve, directly or indirectly, some claim or question to or respecting property of Rs 10,000 in value or upwards, the reference is to suits in existence and not to suits in gremio futuri (6). The reason for fixing the minimum appealable value is based on the principle of not allowing the litigants, who have not succeeded in the High Courts, to be harassed by further appeals, when there is nothing at stake but small amounts of money (7). But to meet special cases, not satisfying the conditions mentioned in sect 110, such for instance as those in which the point in dispute is not measurable by money, though it may be of great public or private importance, an appeal may be granted under sect 109, clause (c), when the High Court certifies that the case is fit for appeal "otherwise," that is when not meeting the conditions of sect. 100 (1) The mere assent of the respondent to an appeal cannot give to the appellant a right of appeal which the Code does not allow nor can it sustain a certificate which is obviously erroneous (3) The defendant will not be allowed to make a new case based on grounds which were not urged in the Courts in India nor specified in the petition to the High Court for leave to appeal nor suggested in the reasons contained in the case for the appellant (3)

"The amount or value."—The section incorporates the provisions of the Privy Council Appeals Act of 1874 (4) This does not mean the value as estimated for the payment of stamp duty, but the real or market value The stamp duties imposed for fiscal purposes are calculated on a certain rule fixed by law, but the right of appeal depends on the value, which is a matter of fact (5) The words "The value of the subject-matter in the Court of first instance" do not in any way affect the right of appeal when the real value of the subject matter is Rs 10,000 (6) The Court has only to look at the value of the question at issue in the litigation (7) As regards the Court of first instance the section speaks of the value of the subject-matter of the suit, and as regards the appeal to the Privy Council of the matter in dispute There is a distinction between the two, (8) what is such matter depends on the facts of each case (9) "And" in the first clause of sect 110 means "and" and not "or" Thus where the value of the subject matter of the suit in the Court of first instance was below Rs 10,000, held by the Privy Council that this section did not apply, for the case must comply with both conditions to justify the admission of an appeal (1) To determine the value the decree is to be looked at as it affects the interests of the party prejudiced by it. Where the detriment to the party seeking relief is estimated at less than Rs 10,000, the amount of the matter in dispute in appeal is not of the prescribed value (2) In suits for partition the value is that amount of the whole estate which it is sought to partition, and not merely of the particular share which one of the parties may claim (3) The value of mesne profits subsequent to suit is to be taken into consideration in calculating the appealable value (4) In actions of tort where the damages are at large it is not easy to define the value (5) In a suit to enforce a mortgage security the value is the amount claimed if such amount falls short of the value of the mortgaged property, but it is the value of the property if this is exceeded by the amount due under the mortgage (6) Where the appeal is from the whole decree, and the decree has given an amount, including interest up to the date of the decree, which exceeds Rs 10,000, it is clear that the matter which is in dispute in the appeal must exceed the sum of Rs 10,000, for the question to be tried upon the appeal must be whether the decree is or is not right, i.e. whether the decree has or has not properly ordered payment of a sum exceeding Rs 10,000. Where, therefore, at the date of the judgment, the sum which is recoverable is an amount (including interest) exceeding Rs 10,000, there is an appeal to the Privy Council. But interest accruing subsequent to the date of the decree cannot be added by the High Courts in estimating the appealable value, and it is a question for the discretion of the Judicial Committee, whether such interest should be added or not (7) But the costs of a suit are no part of the subject matter in dispute, and cannot be used for the purpose of estimating the appealable value, if they were allowed to be added to the principal sum claimed, it would be in the power of every litigant, by swelling the costs, to bring any suit up to the appealable value (1) If a certificate be granted or leave to appeal given by the proper Court in India in a matter in which they have no jurisdiction, the Judicial Committee will dismiss the appeal as incompetent. But if an appeal is competently made, and it appears to their Lordships after argument, or is admitted at the Bar, that the greater part of it must fail, it is the constant practice of their Lordships to give relief in respect of the portion in which the appellant succeeds, notwithstanding that the subject matter of that portion of the appeal may be less than the prescribed limit. Thus where a certificate was given in the presence of the parties that the value of the matter in dispute on appeal exceeded Rs 10,000, but the appellant's counsel, being satisfied that the appeal could not succeed as to the whole demand, had by his printed case and at the Bar, confined his argument to the question of a sum below Rs 10,000, held by the Privy Council that the value of the subject matter on appeal was not reduced below Rs 10,000 (2) It was held in the case of a large number of suits tried together and dealt with in one judgment that inasmuch as although, if each case were taken separately, the value was below Rs 10,000, yet if taken collectively the aggregate reached that amount and the cases were all dependent upon the same judgment leave to appeal should be given (3)

Or the decree must involve "directly or indirectly"—It is not enough that the question decided by such decree is a question of title which may possibly affect the title of persons not parties to the decree, to property not the subject-matter of the suit in which the decree was passed and concerning the title to which property there is no litigation pending (4) In a recent case, however, where the value had been over Rs 10,000 in the Court of first instance and less than that sum on appeal to the Privy Council, but the decision by the Privy Council would involve the validity of an award concerning larger sums it was held that a certificate should be granted and that it was not necessary that a dispute respecting other property to a value of more than Rs 10,000 should be pending at the time of the application (5) As to whether such a claim is or is not involved must depend on the circumstances of each case, (6) as to the consolidation of suits, see O XLVI r 4

the Court below Can a "decision" be said to be affirmed when, although the "decree" is upheld, the High Court in its judgment disagrees with the findings of the fact of the Court below? There is no definition of the word "decision" in the Code, but this word means the decision of a suit by the Court, or the decree, and not the "judgment," i.e. the statement of the grounds on which the Court makes a decree Thus, when a decision is affirmed it is not necessary that the Appellate Court should not only affirm the decree made by the Court below, but should also affirm the grounds of fact upon which that judgment was passed Where an Appellate Court dismissed an appeal, but the reasons given by it in respect of some matters of fact were not the same as given by the lower Court, it was held by the Privy Council that the decree of the lower Court had been affirmed by the Appellate Court The words "decision of the Court" in this section mean the decree and not the judgment (1) A petitioner for leave to appeal claimed Rs 77,000 odd as the value of the land taken under land acquisition proceedings The Collector assessed the value at Rs 28,287, the Judge upheld the Collector's award On appeal to the High Court (valuing the appeal at Rs 49,000 and odd, i.e. the difference between the Collector's award and the amount claimed) the High Court allowed the petitioner an additional sum of Rs 7000 On an application for leave to appeal it was held that the decree was a decree of affirmance of the first Court's decree, and there being no substantial question of law, leave was refused In giving judgment the Court said, "No doubt, in one sense it may be said that this Court did not affirm the decision of the Court below But we must look to the substance of the case What is the decree from which the present applicant now desires to appeal to the Privy Council? He desires to appeal only against the decision of this Court so far as it affirmed the decision of the Court below, nothing else This seems to be, in substance, as far as the subject matter of appeal goes a decree of affirmance If the decree of this Court had been properly drawn, it would have dismissed the appeal except to the extent that the additional sum was given (2)

"Substantial question of law"—In the first place it must appear that the question is one of law (3) It does not follow that because it would be such a question in England it is so here Thus according to English law it is for the Judge and not for the jury to determine what is reasonable and probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution The jury finds the facts, the Judge draws the proper inference from the findings of the jury. In that sense the question is a question of law. But where the case is tried without a jury there is really nothing but a question of fact, and a question of fact to be determined by one and the same person. Where the Courts in India come to the same finding about the existence or non existence of reasonable and probable cause there is a concurrent finding on a question of fact, and no certificate, under sect. 600 certifying that the appeal involves a substantial question of law, should be given (1). Where no question of law, either as to construction of documents or any other point, arises on the judgment of the High Court, and there are concurrent findings on the oral and documentary evidence, no appeal will be entertained (2). Where the order allowing leave to appeal ran, "There seems to be a point of law, which, however, does not appear to have been argued here," the appeal was dismissed as the leave was granted contrary to the provisions of the Code (3). The question of law involved must be a "substantial" (4) one, which in the case cited was suggested to mean a question of great public or private importance (5). Whether, however, the question is "substantial" or not must depend upon the circumstances of each case, and the reported decisions are of value only as illustrations of the application of the general principle. The construction of a deed of Hebanama was held to be such a question (6). But the rejection of an application for admission of additional evidence in the Appellate Court is not (7). The High Court has refused an appeal upon a mere question of practice such as an order for inspection of documents (8). Lastly if there is a point of law which is also "substantial" it must be "involved" in the appeal. The word "involve" implies a considerable degree of necessity. It does not mean that in certain contingencies a question of law might possibly arise. The practice of the Privy Council is not to interfere with concurrent findings of fact of the Courts below (9). If the High Court is right in holding that there are concurrent findings of fact the inference is that the Privy Council will decline to go behind those findings. No doubt it was held by Pontifex, J. (10) that the questions of law referred to were not limited to questions arising out of the facts concurrently found by the Courts below. Application for review of judgment — Save for the words in italics this section corresponds with a portion of sect 376 of Act VII of 1859 as modified by a portion of sect 623 of Act X of 1877. In Act VIII of 1859 the clauses (a), (b), and (c) ran “by a decree of a Court of original jurisdiction from which no appeal shall have been preferred to a Supreme Court or by a decree of a District Court in appeal from which no appeal shall have been admitted by the Sudder Court or by a decree of the Sudder Court from which either no appeal may have been preferred to Her Majesty in Council, or an appeal having been preferred no proceedings in the suit have been transmitted to Her Majesty in Council”. Their present form was given by the Code of 1877 save that by the present section the words “by this Code” have been substituted for “heretofore” and “decision” for “judgment”. The remaining words in italics are new.

The terms of this section are repeated in O. XLVII. r. 1, where the remainder of sect. 623 of the Codes of 1877 and 1882 is given. Order XLVII. substantially contains the provisions of the Chapter on review of judgment in the Codes of 1877 and 1882. See notes to O. XLVII., post.

thereto, and if such subordinate Court appears—

(a) to have exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law, or

(b) to have failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested, or

(c) to have acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity, the High Court may make such order in the case as it thinks fit.

Revision.—The revisional power has been held to be not an inherent power, but one conferred by statute; and that while a power of superintendence is given to the High Courts over all Courts, the revisional power in the case of each branch of jurisdiction is the creation of separate and distinct legislation. (1) Jurisdiction has been generally divided into original (whether ordinary or extraordinary) and appellate jurisdiction. Differing views have been held upon the question whether the power of revision under this section, and of superintendence under clause 15 of the High Courts Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 104, comes or does not come under the head of appellate jurisdiction. (2) In the former view, the capital distinction is between jurisdiction which is original, and jurisdiction which is not original, irrespective of the circumstances and conditions in which the latter is to be exercised. Appellate jurisdiction may thus be exercised in a variety of forms—as in what is commonly known as appeal, revision, or superintendence. (3) In the latter view, appeal, revision, and superintendence, though distinct from original jurisdiction, come under different heads of jurisdictions—viz. appellate, revisional, and superintending. (4) The Code of 1859 gave the Courts no revisional powers. By clause 15 of the High Courts Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 104, which was passed on August 6, 1861, each of the High Courts which were thereafter to be established under that Act were given a power of superintendence over all Courts subject to their appellate jurisdiction. The Presidency High Courts were not established until the issue of their first Letters Patent in 1862; but before that date, Act XXIII of 1861, which was passed on August 25th of that year, gave in sect. 35 powers of revision in a very restricted form to the Sudder Court. Under that Act, the Sudder Court might call for the record of any case decided on appeal in which no further appeal lay if the Subordinate Court, on hearing the appeal, appeared to have exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law. When, therefore, the High Courts were established, among the powers vested in it were those of revision given to the Sudder Court under sect. 35 of the Act of 1861, which is the basis of the present section (1). The power of revision was thus limited to cases decided on appeal where the lower Court had exceeded its jurisdiction (2).

The question then arose as to the nature of the jurisdiction given by clause 15 of the High Courts Act. It was held by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court that the Letters Patent conferred no powers of revision, that in such matters the High Court had only such powers as the Sudder Court had, and that the power of "superintendence" conferred by the High Courts Act gave the Court no revisional power, no power to interfere with or set aside the judicial proceedings of a Subordinate Court, but that clause 15 conferred on the High Court administrative authority and not judicial powers (3). In a subsequent Full Bench of the same Court (4) the Judges said that they would prefer not to use the terms "administrative authority" or "judicial powers," or "judicial superintendence," as without giving exhaustive definitions of the words which it might fail to do the Court might by using them lead to future difficulty, and that each case must be considered as it arose. That the authority of the High Courts under this clause is not merely administrative, appears from a decision of the Privy Council approving the judgment of the Calcutta High Court, which, holding that it could interfere with orders passed without jurisdiction, stayed proceedings on one order and quashed another (5). There has been no doubt a disinclination, and rightly, on the part of some Judges to rigidly define what they can or cannot, do by way of their powers of superintendence, which have been said to be very wide (1) Certain limitations have, however been laid down which will ordinarily govern the Courts, there being a residue of undefined jurisdiction to which the Court may have recourse in cases of an unusual character (2)

Sect 622 of the Code of 1877 was the same as that of the last Code, except that the words "or to have acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally, or with material irregularity," were not in it It thus extended the power of revision, which was no longer limited to cases decided on appeal, and which might be exercised not only where the Court exceeded its jurisdiction but declined a jurisdiction which was vested in it Lastly, by sect 92 of Act XII of 1879, the words italicised were added, since when the section retained the same form As regards the amendments now effected, which are of an unimportant character, vide post

As regards the Charter Act, it has been held that the High Court will interfere where the Court has wrongly declined jurisdiction,(3) or has exceeded its jurisdiction,(4) that is in the first two contingencies mentioned in this section If, however, the Court has jurisdiction it will not (ordinarily at least) interfere merely because the order passed in such jurisdiction is erroneous either in law or fact (5) An erroneous decision by a Court having jurisdiction can only properly be corrected by appeal, and if the right of appeal does not exist the same results which an appeal would give cannot be arrived at indirectly (6) While these rules are of general application in cases of an ordinary character there is a residue of jurisdiction which the Courts have left undefined So where the Court had jurisdiction to entertain a suit, but passed a decree therein which was contrary to law and was incapable of execution, the High Court interfered to set matters right (1) Generally, the High Court will direct a Subordinate Court to do its duty or to abstain from taking action in matters of which it has no cognizance (2) It will direct it to do that which is legal, and correct that which is illegal in its proceedings (3) and will correct abuse of powers by a Subordinate Court (4)

From the above review of the case law it will appear that to a large extent clause 15 and this section cover common ground In neither case will these extraordinary powers be exercised where matters can be corrected by appeal In neither case (in that of the Charter ordinarily at least) will the Court interfere in such a way as to give a party the benefit of an appeal when the law says that he is not to have one In both cases the Court will interfere where jurisdiction is concerned The section applies also expressly to cases of illegal exercise of jurisdiction and material irregularity It will therefore be, as regards judicial matters, only necessary to resort to the Charter Act in cases in which the revisional powers given by the Civil and Criminal Procedure Codes do not apply, (5) or where it is doubtful (6) whether they do apply by reason of the nature of the proceedings sought to be corrected, (7) or where the order passed in proceedings which considered apart from the matter complained of are subject to the ordinary revisional powers is of a very peculiar character (8) or in cases where the administrative authority of the High Court is required to be invoked Courts in the exercise of superintending powers will not ordinarily interfere except in cases of grave and otherwise irreparable injustice (9)

As regards other revisional jurisdictions, the Bombay High Court has interfered under Reg II of 1827 (Bom) (10) Sect 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887) provides that the High Court for the purpose of satisfying itself that a decree or order made on any case decided by a Court of Small Causes was according to law (11) may call for the case and pass such order with respect thereto as it thinks fit In a recent case in the Calcutta High Court where an application (under sect 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act) for the recovery of the possession of immoveable property had been refused on the ground that the relationship of landlord and tenant had not been established, and it had been held by a single Judge sitting on the Original Side that (assuming that this refusal was erroneous) the High Court was not justified in interfering under this section, it was held on appeal that the High Court had a right of revision and that this order was a judgment (1) It is generally agreed that this provision gives no right of appeal either on law or fact, (2) that the exercise of the power given is discretionary, (3) and that the High Court will be slow to interfere when substantial justice has been done, though technically the plaintiff or defendant may have a legitimate ground of attack or defence (4) It is also established that there is no rule that a Court cannot act under sect 25, except in cases in which it might act under the present section (5) The High Court's power of interfering in revision conferred by the Provincial Small Cause Court Act is wider than the power conferred by the present section (6) The Allahabad High Court has, however in several cases considered that the discretion to be exercised under sect 25 should be ordinarily guided by the same considerations as those which governed the application of this section (7) though a Judge is not absolutely bound to refuse any application under sect 25, which could not be admitted under the present section (8) The Bombay High Court however, has held that the provisions of the present section do not afford a safe guide for the exercise of jurisdiction under the Provincial Small Cause Court Act, since the wording of the two sections is wholly different that of the Small Cause Court Act being of the widest description and conferring the most ample discretion on the High Court, whilst this section ought to be construed in a restricted and limited sense (9) What the order should be where the Court determines to interfere must depend entirely on the circumstances of the case (10) Sect 48 of the Guardians and Wards Act is subject to the provisions of this section (11)

High Court.—The power of revision under this section belongs to the High Court only, it being intended that it should be exercised in correction only of such errors as were not open to appeal, and within certain specified limits (1) Under the Charter Act the Chief Justice determines what Judges shall constitute Benches to hear suits and applications (2)

"May call for."—The section gives discretionary power to the High Court to interfere or not (3) In the case cited below, (4) Sir Arnold White, C J, stating that he "would be glad to find some mode of escape," yet considered that if he was satisfied that the Court of first instance or Court of Appeal had exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law, he was bound to interfere and exercise the powers conferred by the section This, however, it is submitted, is not so The word "may" governs the whole section, and indicates a discretion whether the ground upon which interference is sought is one of jurisdiction or illegality, or material irregularity, and the concluding words are, that the Court may pass such order as it thinks fit So where an order was passed without jurisdiction, but no objection was taken before the District Court, the High Court declined to interfere, as if it were to set aside the order of the District Court it would have the effect of placing the opposite party in the position of being obliged to bring a suit to establish the right which he claimed, though the period within which he was entitled to bring that suit had elapsed, in other words, it would be placing him under an obligation to bring a suit that prima facie would be barred under the Limitation Act (5) So also in an earlier case the Calcutta High Court observed as follows—"Now, as the order of the Judge in this matter, although passed without jurisdiction, was really a right order, and had merely the effect of getting rid of the decision of the first Court, which was wrong, we think we ought not to make any order in this case" (6)

A fortiori the same freedom exists as regards illegalities and irregularities So the High Court, in the under mentioned case, (7) declined, under the circumstances, to interfere, even though the orders complained of were made irregularly Thus a Munsif granted a review on a ground on which it was held it could not legally have been granted His order in review, however, had the effect of making the decree a right, instead of a wrong decree The District Judge allowed an appeal from that order on grounds which, having regard to sect 629

of the last Code, were, it was held, not open to him. On application for revision of this Appellate order, it was held that the proper course was to set aside only the District Judge's order, and to leave standing the order of the Munsif granting a review, which order, though wrong in principle, was, it appeared, right in its results (1). In an application under this section, the extraordinary jurisdiction is invoked, and the Court must be on its guard against its being abused, merely because the lower Court has fallen into formal error (2). Again, the Court does not interfere if the result of any irregularity on the part of the lower Court has been to promote the justice of the case (3). In short, it is this justice of the case and not any mere technicality which will influence the Court's interference. It has been held that the Court cannot interfere under this section on the ground that an order is inexpedient (4). Assuming that the section applies, the Court is not bound to act under it in every case (5).

As the power is a discretionary one, the Court may refuse to interfere where there has been laches or delay in moving the Court, (6) inasmuch as delay, unless explained, is evidence of absence of real injury and ground for complaint, and may, where it is considerable, prejudice the position of the opposing party, and if by his laches a party has failed to avail himself of other remedies open to him, he has no claim to invoke the extraordinary jurisdiction of the Court. The Court will, in all cases, regard its exercise of the extraordinary jurisdiction as discretionary, and subject to considerations of the importance of the particular case, or of the principle involved in it, of delay on the part of an applicant, and of his merits with respect to the case in which the interference of the Court is sought (7).

The Court will not, as a rule, interfere in revision with an exercise of discretion, though it may not approve of it (8). It was held that even if a party were not entitled to appeal to have a decree against him set aside, the error of the lower Court could be corrected under this section by a direction to exercise the discretionary powers given by sect. 554 of the last Code (9).

The High Court can interfere under this section of its own motion, and without an application made to it by a party to the suit (1) Revisional power has been exercised on the application of a pre emptor in regard to a sale, (2) of a Collector in regard to an order under sect 412 of the last Code, (3) and on the report of a District Judge (4) But the High Court will not interfere on a reference by the Collector with a Mamlatdar's decision in a possessory suit The aggrieved party can himself apply to the Court (5)

"Any case"—The matter must be a civil one, and also one in which there is no remedy by way of appeal Mahmood, J, was of opinion that the word should be understood in its broadest and most ordinary sense, including all adjudications which might constitute the subject of appeal or revision (6) It has, however, been a matter of dispute whether the section applies to interlocutory orders when there is an appeal from the final decree The Calcutta High Court has held that there is nothing in this section which prevents the High Court from setting aside an interlocutory order, and that the word "case" is wide enough to include such an order, and the words "records of any case" include so much of the proceedings in any suit as relate to an interlocutory order (7) The Bombay, (8) Allahabad, (9) and Madras (10) High Courts answer the question in the negative, and in a recent case in the Calcutta High Court the question has been considered doubtful (11)

It may be that the word "case" is wide enough to include an interlocutory order, but it must be controlled by due regard to the purpose with which this section was framed, which was to enable the party to a suit to get a decision or order of a lower Court rectified where there would otherwise be no remedy It is on this ground, therefore, that it has been held that an application under this section cannot be entertained in the case of those interlocutory orders against which, though no immediate appeal lies a remedy is supplied by sect

591 (now 105), which provides that they may be made a ground of objection in the appeal against the final decree (1)

The High Court has revised, under this section, proceedings under Reg of 1806, relating to foreclosure, (2) adjudications under sect 407 of the last Code, (3) an order under sect 335 of the same Code, though provisionally final, (4) an order under the Bombay Hereditary Offices Act, (5) an order under sect 5 of the Religious Endowments Act, (6) an order under sect 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, (7) a lunacy matter (8) Whether an order under the former sect 310A was subject to appeal or revision depended on the circumstances of each particular case (9) A decision under sect 5 of the Court Fees Act is not a decision in a case within the meaning of this section (10) The matter of amending a decree does not by itself constitute a "case," but forms part of the proceedings in the suit in which the decree is made (11) On the same principle, viz the order being of an interlocutory character only, the High Court has refused to deal with an order relating to an award, (12) though in other cases relating to awards it has interfered (13) It has been held that an order passed under the Legal Practitioners Act is not a criminal proceeding, nor one within the powers of civil revision (14) Seemle, that it was the intention of the Legislature that the Court which originally heard a case should be the Court to decide whether an application to review its former judgment should, or should not, be granted, and where that Court rejects such an application, its decision should not be open either to appeal or to revision by a higher Court (15) In a recent Full Bench decision of the Calcutta High Court, the case of an order passed by a Civil or Revenue Court under sect 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code was considered, and it was held that sect 139 of the Criminal Procedure Code did not apply, and that the High Court could exercise the powers vested in it by this section and by sect. 15 of the High Courts Act, and that the Bench exercising Criminal Jurisdiction could not (as such) deal with the matter on revision, but could be specially authorized to do so by the Chief Justice under sect. 14 of the High Courts Act (1) An application under this section to set aside an award is incompetent (2) A decision of a Subordinate Court on a question of valuation determining the amount of a Court fee is, notwithstanding its declared finality, subject to revision under this section, and sect. 5, Reg. II of 1827 (3) Proceedings under sect. 206 of the former Code terminated in an order, and could thus be dealt with in revision (4) Sect. 153 of Act X of 1859 does not preclude revision by the High Court of an order of a Collector, which is final within the meaning of that section (5) An application to a Judge of a Presidency Small Cause Court for sanction to prosecute a plaintiff for making a false claim in a suit before him is a case within the meaning of this section (6)

"In which no appeal lies."—The Court cannot act under this section where there is an appeal, (7) even where the petitioner has to invoke the provisions of sect. 5 of the Limitation Act (8) The reason of the rule is that there is another and more complete remedy. It is a matter of dispute whether in the case of interlocutory orders, against which there is no immediate appeal, the Court can interfere under this section, seeing that a remedy is supplied by sect. 105, which provides that such orders may be made a ground of objection in the appeal against the final decree. In such cases it is said the appeal is merely deferred (9) In a recent case it has been doubted whether interlocutory orders come within the scope of this section (10)

On the same principle it has been held that the Court will not exercise its revisional jurisdiction so long as there is any other remedy open to the petitioner, viz. by regular suit or otherwise (11) Probably it is more correct to say that there is no absolute rule in the matter such as exists in the prohibition relating to appealable cases, and that while the Court will in general discourage applications under this section when some other remedy has been provided, the exercise of the revisional powers is discretionary according to the circumstances of the particular case. In some cases justice, therefore, may require the Court's interference (1)

Sect 588 (now 104) by enacting that the orders passed under it shall be final only bars appeals from these orders, but does not intend to bar any interference with them by revision (2)

In some cases, where an appeal was preferred but no appeal lay, the Court has dealt with the case as though an application has been originally made to it under this section and allowed the appeal to be treated as an application under it (3). Conversely, a civil revisional petition has been treated as an appeal on the Court fee being paid (4). It seems reasonable that appellants should be permitted to rely on the provisions of this section without putting them to the expense of making a separate application to get the benefit of it (5). Some Judges however, take a stricter and more formal view of the matter, and require a separate and distinct application to be made (6). It is as well, therefore in cases of doubt whether an appeal lies to file concurrently (7) both an appeal and an application under this section to be heard and disposed of together.

where justice is judicially ministered " A District Registrar is therefore not a Court, and the High Court cannot revise his proceedings (1)

"Subordinate."—The Court referred to in the words "If the Court" of the former section was a Court other than the High Court. The section therefore did not apply to a case where the order of which review was sought was made by the High Court (2). It applies to subordinate Courts as the amended section now makes clear. The High Court has jurisdiction under this section over the Presidency Small Cause Courts, and applications can be dealt with by a specially constituted Bench, (3) or, according to the existing rule in the Calcutta High Court, by a single Judge sitting on the Original Side (4). This section applies to a Mamlatdar's Court in Bombay, (5) and a Court acting under the Dekkan Agriculturists Relief Act, (6) and the Court of the Resident at Aden in the exercise of his civil jurisdiction under the Aden Act (7).

A decision under sect. 5 of the Court Fees Act is not, it has been held, (8) the decision of a Court within the meaning of this section. A District Judge acting under sect. 23 of the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Act (II of 1884) is not a "Court" under this section, and the High Court has therefore no jurisdiction to revise his order refusing to set aside an election (9). Neither is a Collector acting under sect. 11 of the Land Acquisition Act "a Court" (10). This section does not apply to a Revenue Court in Madras, (11) or in the North-West Provinces (12). The High Court at Bombay under clause 29 of the Council Order relating to Zanzibar of the year 1897 has power of revision over all the Civil Courts of Zanzibar (13).

Jurisdiction—The word "jurisdiction" is used in two different senses: it may either mean what is ordinarily understood by the term "jurisdiction"—that is, jurisdiction local, pecuniary, personal, or with reference to the subject-matter of a suit, (14) or it may mean the legal authority of a Court to do certain things, to make a particular order in a case over which it has jurisdiction in the sense stated. So if a Court has jurisdiction to deal with an appeal in the former sense, it is only in the latter sense that an erroneous order of remand by an Appellate Court can be treated as an order without jurisdiction (1). It was held in the case first cited that the word "jurisdiction" is used in the former sense in sect. 578 of the former Code (now 99). In some cases it has been held that the term is used in both senses in the present section (2). In other cases it has been said that the word "jurisdiction" is used in the first mentioned sense and refers to the forum for the institution of a suit (3). It would probably tend to clearness in the law if the word were used in the narrow and more ordinary sense, (4) though, as has been pointed out, (5) the extent to which the restraints attaching to the mode of exercise of jurisdiction should be included in the conception of the jurisdiction itself is a question of nicety upon which there has been considerable difference of judicial opinion. A Judge cannot assume as a matter of law that which in fact has no existence in law, and so give himself jurisdiction. He cannot, by wrongly determining a question, give himself jurisdiction, and the High Court may thus inquire whether such question is rightly or wrongly decided (6).

On the principle omnia rite acta, the Court will not presume that a Judge has acted without jurisdiction (7). Indeed, it has on the contrary been said, that unless the facts from which want of jurisdiction on the part of a Subordinate Court may be inferred are patent upon the face of the record, the High Court will not interfere in revision (8). The High Court may interfere where the lower Court appears to have exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law, (9) or to have their powers, and the High Court is called upon to enlarge their too narrow views (1) If a Court allows an application or decrees a suit which is in fact time barred, without considering whether it was so or not, it can be said to have failed to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it by law, so as to bring the matter within the scope of this section. But this cannot be said of a Court merely because it has omitted to consider ex proprio motu the question whether a litigant was entitled to proceed out of time by reason of some special provision of law, when such a question had not been raised by him or on his behalf (2) The High Court can interfere under this section when the Court below refused to exercise the jurisdiction vested in it by reason of an erroneous interpretation of a provision of the Code (3)

Illegality—The first part of the section down to the words "so tested" deals with jurisdiction. The remainder assumes the existence of jurisdiction, but deals with the mode in which such jurisdiction is exercised. A question may arise, whether a Court in the exercise of the jurisdiction it possesses has acted according to law. Such a question relates not to the existence of jurisdiction, but to the exercise of it in either an illegal or irregular manner (1). This distinction has not always been preserved, it being in some earlier cases considered erroneously that the Privy Council had decided (2) that only questions relating to the jurisdiction of the Court can be entertained under this section (3). This opinion, however, is not tenable, since it practically treats the additional words added to the section in 1879 as superfluous or unnecessarily introduced (4). All that the Privy Council case really decides is that this section does not give a right of appeal on questions of law or fact, and that where the Subordinate Court has jurisdiction, the High Court can only interfere where that Court has acted illegally and with material irregularity in the exercise of such jurisdiction (5).

A Court cannot interfere under this section simply upon the ground that there has been an erroneous decision upon a question of law or fact (6). A Court that has decided a suit over which it had jurisdiction cannot, only on the ground that it has arrived at a wrong decision, be said to have exercised its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity (7). Any other view would impose on the Court the duties of a Court of Appeal. Mere errors of law and fact can only be corrected by appeal. Such is a wrong decision on a question of res judicata (1) or limitation, (2) or a merely erroneous construction of the provisions of an Act (3) or a decision as to the inadmissibility of a document in evidence, (4) or the misconstruction of a document, (5) or a decision that a person was not a legal representative within the meaning of sect 17, ante (6). Where a Judge having both Small Cause and ordinary jurisdiction transferred to his file as ordinary Judge a suit filed in his Court as a Small Cause Court suit, it was held that there was not a material irregularity, and that as his decree decided a question of title to immoveable property, the High Court could not interfere under its extraordinary jurisdiction, for since this decree could not have been passed in a Small Cause Court, it was not final (7).

The mere fact of a Court having come to a wrong decision even on a point of law is not sufficient to constitute an illegality or irregularity, (8) that is, an erroneous decision is not by itself any ground for revision. The Privy Council have thus excluded one class of cases, but it is still left open to consider in what other cases the clause may be applicable (1) This is a question of difficulty, upon which there has been considerable conflict of opinion. There may be a decision which is erroneous, but not illegal or materially irregular (2) It is not always easy to draw a clear line between an illegal exercise of jurisdiction and a mistake of law (3) A distinction has been drawn between an irregular act and an erroneous decision (4) but the distinction is, ordinarily at least, of little use, as the illegal or irregular act is generally preceded by, and based upon, an erroneous decision.

It is not difficult to give examples of extreme cases. The difficulty exists as to those falling within these limits. Thus, a wrong decision based upon an erroneous construction of sect. 11 that a suit is not barred by res judicata is no ground for revision, (5) but a Judge would not illegally who, while admitting that a case fell within the section, held that as the former decision was erroneous, he would on this ground determine the point again, (6) or if he directed, contrary to the provisions of sect. 60, that in execution of a decree the tools of a judgment debtor be sold (7) So it has been held that this part of the section contemplates a perverse decision on a question of law or procedure—that is a decision involving a conscious departure from some rules of law or procedure (8).

The Calcutta High Court has gone further, and held that while acting with “material irregularity” implies only the committing of an error of procedure, acting “illegally” does not mean the same thing for Courts may commit gross and palpable errors other than those of procedure which would justify it being said that they had acted “illegally,” and that this part of the section was intended to authorize the High Courts to interfere and correct gross and palpable errors of Subordinate Courts, so as to prevent gross injustice in non-appellable cases, and that it was advisedly expressed in indefinite language from the difficulty of defining exactly the classes of cases which may stand in need of such extraordinary interference. In this view, the question whether any case comes under the clause has to be determined with reference to the grossness and palpableness of the error complained of, and to the gravity of the injustice resulting from it (9).

Coming to the particular application of the section, the following cases have been expressly held, or may perhaps be considered to have been held, to come under the heading of acting “illegally”—the rule of adjudication being that a Judge shall decide, secundum allegata et probata a Judge was held

Irregularity.—Just as in the reported cases, questions of illegality are mixed up with those of jurisdiction, so it is not easy always to distinguish "illegality" from "material irregularity." In fact as will have been seen from the notes to the last paragraph, the Courts have often spoken of the same act as being both an illegality and irregularity. A distinction has been drawn between cases in which a Judge omits to do something which a Statute enacts shall be done, and cases in which a Judge does something which a Statute says shall not be done. In the former case, the omission may not amount to more than an irregularity in procedure. In the latter, the doing of the prohibited thing is ultra vires and illegal and without jurisdiction (14) using the latter term in its broadest sense. It has been said also that material "irregularity" implies only the committing of an error of procedure, whilst acting "illegally" means something more (15). One thing is clear, namely, that an irregularity is something less than an illegality, and before the Court will interfere

it must be shown to be material—that is, an irregularity which has prejudicially affected the merits of the case

Certain cases of what has been held to be material irregularity will be found noted in the commentary on “acting illegally.” Other reported cases are—determining an issue which does not really arise in the case, and basing the decision on such determination, (1) omissions or errors of procedure in the investigation of a matter, such as the omission to comply with the procedure prescribed by sect 3 of Act XIX of 1841, relative to curators, (2) entertaining and granting an application under sect 108 of the last Code, without notice to the other side, in contravention of the directions of sect 109 of the same Code, (3) determining a suit upon an issue which was not one on which the dispute between the parties could be properly adjudicated upon, (4) treating delivery of summons by post to a person who was not shown to have been the defendant as good service, (5) Judge and Assessors sitting to determine amount of compensation to be awarded under Land Acquisition Act, and refusing to take into consideration any of the matters prescribed by sect 24 of that Act, or improperly taking into consideration any of the matters prohibited by sect 25 thereof, (6) Appellate Court disposing of a suit on a point taken by itself in appeal without affording the parties an opportunity of proving what was necessary to meet that point, or deciding the suit without hearing the parties at all, (7) where evidence has been improperly taken, (8) appointment of a curator under Act XIX of 1841 without holding inquiry under sect 3 of that Act, (9) grant of leave under sect 18 of the Religious Endowments Act on an unverified petition not presented in Court, (10) in contravention of sect 629, now O XLVII r 7, entertaining an appeal from an order admitting a review, (11) going into a fresh point on a new trial the materials necessary for its decision not being before the Court, (12) wrongly holding as regards service, and there upon passing ex parte decree, (13) refusing to draw up a preliminary decree in accordance with the findings, (1) ordering the amount deposited to be returned to the transferee of a non transferable occupancy holding, (2) failing to decide an issue which became necessary by the reversal of the decision of other issues by the first Court, (3) an order for consolidation of suits which is erroneous in principle and will lead to irremediable mischief, (4) allowing withdrawal of suit under O XXIII r 1, with leave to file a fresh suit on the same cause of action after the defendant had obtained a decree in his favour; (5) interference by a Collector, under sect 23 of the Mamlatdar's Court Act, with the findings on fact of a Mamlatdar which are on their face legal and regular. (6) It has been held that failure of a lower Appellate Court to frame and try the requisite issue under O XLI r 25 may, under certain circumstances, be a material irregularity (7) But the mere fact that a lower Court erroneously refused to allow amendment of a plaint is not ground for interference (8)

"May pass such order."—The words employed indicate very wide powers, and the Court may do or direct anything to be done which it considers called for under the circumstances. The actual order will, however, be controlled by these latter (9) Where the decision of a Court of first instance, or of both such Court and the Appellate Court, are without jurisdiction, the Court has set aside both decisions and returned the plaint for presentation in the proper Court (10) In such a case there has been no trial, and the High Court will not undertake the functions of a Court before which the case should have, but has never, gone. Where want of jurisdiction is alleged as regards the Appellate Court only, if the latter Court exceeds its jurisdiction, the High Court may set aside that portion of the order which was in excess of jurisdiction, and if the Appellate Court had not jurisdiction at all, it may set aside the decision altogether, and may refer the appeal to the Court which had jurisdiction, even if it were too late to prefer a fresh appeal to that Court (11) But if the original order was non appealable, the Court, in setting aside the decision on appeal of a Court not possessed of jurisdiction, will not enter into the question of the merits in order to determine if the first order was correct or not (12) It has been held that the Court may at least pass any order which it might be authorized to pass on second appeal (13) The question, however, whether the High Court, in dealing with a case under this section, can examine the evidence and itself investigate the facts is the object of conflict. In some cases it has done so, (14) in others not (15)

RULES.

121 The rules in the First Schedule shall have effect as if enacted in the body of this Code until annulled or altered in accordance with the provisions of this Part.

122 High Courts established under the Indian High Courts Act, 1861, and the Chief Courts of the Punjab and Lower Burma, may, from time to time after previous publication, make rules regulating their own procedure and the procedure of Civil Courts subject to their superintendence, and may by such rules annul, alter or add to all or any of the rules in the First Schedule

123 (1) A Committee, to be called the Rule Committee, shall be constituted at each of the towns of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Allahabad, Lahore and Rangoon

(2) Each such Committee shall consist of the following persons, namely —

- (a) three Judges of the High Court established at the town at which such Committee is constituted, one of whom at least has served as a District Judge or (in the Punjab or Burma) a Divisional Judge for three years,
- (b) a barrister practising in that Court,
- (c) an advocate (not being a barrister) or vakil or pleader enrolled in that Court,
- (d) a Judge of a Civil Court subordinate to the High Court, and
- (e) in the towns of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, an attorney

(3) The members of each such Committee shall be appointed by the Chief Justice or Chief Judge, who shall also nominate one of their number to be president

Provided that, if the Chief Justice or Chief Judge elects to be himself a member of a Committee, the number of other Judges appointed to be members shall be two, and the Chief Justice or Chief Judge shall be the President of the Committee

(4) Each member of any such Committee shall hold office for such period as may be prescribed by the Chief Justice or Chief Judge in this behalf, and whenever any member retires, resigns, dies or ceases to reside in the province in which the Committee was constituted or becomes incapable of acting as a member of the Committee, the said Chief Justice or Chief Judge may appoint another person to be a member in his stead

(5) There shall be a Secretary to each such Committee, who shall be appointed by the Chief Justice or by the Governor-General in Council or by the Local Government and shall receive such remuneration as may be provided in this behalf by the Governor-General in Council or by the Local Government in any case may be

124 Every Rule Committee shall make a report to the High Court established at the town at which it is constituted on any proposal to amend, alter or add to the rules in the First Schedule or to make new rules, and before making any rules under section 122 the High Court shall take such report into consideration

125 High Courts, other than the Courts specified in section 122, may exercise the powers conferred by that section in such manner and subject to such conditions as the Governor-General in Council may determine

Provided that any such High Court may, after previous publication, make a rule extending within the local limits of its jurisdiction any rules which have been made by any other High Court

126 Rules made under the foregoing provisions shall be subject to the previous sanction of the following authorities, namely —

- (a) if the rule is made by a High Court established under the Indian High Courts Act 1861 to the sanction of the authority prescribed by section 10 of that Act for rules made under that section,
- (b) if the rule is made by any other High Court, to the sanction of the Local Government

127. Rules so made and sanctioned shall be published in the Gazette of India or in the local official Gazette,

(2) In particular, and without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-section (1), such rules may provide for all or any of the following matters, namely —

(a) the service of summonses, notices and other processes by post or in any other manner either generally or in any specified areas, and the proof of such service,

(b) the maintenance and custody, while under attachment, of live stock and other moveable property, the fees payable for such maintenance and custody, the sale of such live-stock and property and the proceeds of such sale,

(c) procedure in suits by way of counter-claim, and the valuation of such suits for the purposes of jurisdiction,

(d) procedure in garnishee and charging orders either in addition to, or in substitution for, the attachment and sale of debts,

(e) procedure where the defendant claims to be entitled to contribution or indemnity over against any person whether a party to the suit or not,

(f) summary procedure—

(i) in suits in which the plaintiff seeks only to recover a debt or liquidated demand in money payable by the defendant, with or without interest, arising—

on a contract express or implied, or on an enactment where the sum sought to be recovered is a fixed sum of money or in the nature of a debt other than a penalty, or on a guarantee where the claim against the principal is in respect of a debt or a liquidated demand only, or on a trust, or

(ii) in suits for the recovery of immovable property, with or without a claim for rent or mesne profits, by a landlord against a tenant whose term has expired or has been duly determined by notice to quit, or has become liable to forfeiture for non-payment of rent, or against persons claiming under such tenant ;

(g) procedure by way of originating summons ;

(h) consolidation of suits, appeals and other proceedings ;

(i) delegation to any Registrar Prothonotary or Master or other official of the Court of any judicial, quasi-judicial and non-judicial duties ; and

(j) all forms, registers, books, entries and accounts which may be necessary or desirable for the transaction of the business of Civil Courts.

It has been held that in this section we have legislative recognition that such suits as were maintainable in respect of debts at the time of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, are still maintainable in this country (1)

had power to make rules to regulate the procedure of the original side of the Court, and High Courts and Chief Courts had power to make rules to regulate the procedure of Courts subordinate to them, but neither High Courts nor Chief Courts could make rules to regulate any matters which were dealt with by the Code of Civil Procedure, nor could they in any way affect the provisions of that Code. The power which is given to the High Court in England and other countries was denied to the High Courts in India, with the result that there could be no elasticity in matters of procedure which fell within the ambit of the Code, and that defects in the existing practice could only be remedied, when discovered, by the dilatory process of legislation.

This may have been proper at the time the Code was first enacted, but it has been rightly considered that there is no reason nowadays for denying to the High Courts the power to regulate these minor matters of procedure, a power which they are far more competent to exercise than the Legislature. In the present Code, therefore, the Legislature has enlarged the rule-making powers of the High Courts and Chief Courts, and vested in them the authority to make changes in minor matters of procedure. This is done by placing the sections of the Code relating to these matters in the first Schedule, and giving to the High Courts and Chief Courts power to vary or amend the rules in the Schedule, or to make additional rules on matters which are specified in the Code. The result follows, that the rules in the Schedule provide a procedure for the present, but that that procedure can be altered at any time, and from time to time as seems fit to the Courts. It has been thought desirable that in exercising these wider powers the Courts should have the advice of representatives of the two branches of the legal profession, and accordingly it has been provided that rules should only be made after taking the opinion of a Rule Committee composed of three Judges of the High Court, a Judge of a subordinate Civil Court, and of three other members appointed by the respective Chief Justices or Chief Judges, one representing the Bar, the other the Vakils or Pleaders, and the third the attorneys. It was believed that a Standing Committee of this kind would be of great value. Provision has been made for the appointment of a permanent Secretary to conduct the routine work of the Committee, and, as is hoped, to assist in drafting rules for them.

The division between matters which should be dealt with in the Act and matters which should be left to rules is not easy to determine on any logical basis.

Matters which affect more than one province, and matters in which it is essential that there should be uniformity in all provinces, have been kept in the Act. Minor matters have been relegated to the Schedule. But between these two classes there are many matters as to which opinions may differ whether they are proper subjects for rules or not. It is probably impossible to devise an arrangement which would disarm all criticism, but that adopted in the Code is the best that presented itself at present. It may be said against this innovation that it will create divergence of practice between the various provinces and that this will cause confusion. The answer which has been given is that the divergence will be only in minor matters and that even in this divergence there may be advantages. The conditions and requirements of provinces differ greatly. A rule of procedure which may be proper in Calcutta may be entirely inappropriate in the Punjab. It is desirable that the general principles of procedure should be uniform all over India, but no harm can result from a divergence in the practice in Judges' Chambers, or in the particular form of plaints or interrogatories.

It may also be objected that the plan of putting some of the provisions relating to any particular subject in the Act and others in rules will lead to confusion. This is an objection which applies to all rules made under statutory authority: but it is one which it is hoped will have little force in this particular case as soon as practitioners have become familiar with the altered system.

The rules suggested in the Schedule to the draft will be found to depart to no very considerable extent from the last Code, though important amendments have been made. The subjects of counterclaim and garnishee orders, which were included in the earlier Bill, have been omitted from the Schedule. They raise questions on which there was on which the requirements of different p therefore been thought better not to make .

India, but to leave it to the Courts of each province to introduce them by rules if thought advisable. Power is given in the rule making section for these purposes. With sect 122, compare first paragraph of sect 652 of last Code, with sect 128, O. III r 6, and with sects 129-131, the second, third, and fourth paragraphs respectively of sect 652 of the last Code. New rules published since the date of the last edition are collected in the Appendix.

High Court rules.—These sections correspond with certain modifications with the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of sect 652 of the last Code. The second paragraph of that section was added by sect 63, Act VII of 1888, and the last two paragraphs by sect 2, Act XIII of 1895. Rules made and published under this section have the force of law. Hence, it was held that where an application for execution was not accompanied by a copy of the decree of which execution was sought, the application could not be treated as a step in aid of execution within the meaning of the Limitation Act (1). The rule must not, however, be ultra vires, (2) and no rule, it was held, could add to or modify the conditions and limitations of the law laid down in the Limitation Act (3). It has been recently said by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court that, until such new Rules are made, it is probable that the Rules made under the last Code should be considered as in force (4). As regards paragraph (1) of sect 652 and the High Courts, see sect 122, ante.

manners of the country, ought not to be compelled to appear in public shall be exempt from personal appearance in Court

(2) Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to exempt such women from arrest in execution of civil process in any case in which the arrest of women is not prohibited by this Code

Women—This is the only section which deals with the exemption of women (1) from personal appearance in Court The privilege is limited to the class of persons described in the section, and cannot be claimed by all women of rank (2) It has been designed for the protection of purdanashin The words “who according to,” etc, were held not to apply to a case of a Parsi widow, who alleged that according to Parsi customs she could not leave her house for two years after her husband’s death, the custom being of a varying and uncertain character (3) But a Court, independently of the section, would always have regard to such circumstances as were put forward in that case (viz the alleged custom, age, and health of the applicant, and her desire to leave the jurisdiction) as an excuse for non attendance (4) See notes to O XVIII r 4 and O XXVI r 1

(2) The names and residences of the persons so exempted shall, from time to time, be forwarded to the High Court by the Local Government and a list of such persons shall be kept in such Court, and a list of such persons as reside within the local limits of the jurisdiction of each Court subordinate to the High Court shall be kept in such subordinate Court.

(3) Where any person so exempted claims the privilege of such exemption, and it is consequently necessary to examine him by commission, he shall pay the costs of that commission, unless the party requiring his evidence pays such costs.

Exemption from appearance—Act VIII of 1859, sects 22, 23 The exemption is absolute, and not limited to cases in which the party claiming it has been summoned by the opposite party. A Rajah instituted a suit under Act X of 1859 through an agent appointed in that behalf. The Deputy Collector, not being satisfied with the information which the agent could give, adjourned the hearing to a subsequent day, and required the personal appearance of the Rajah. The Rajah claimed to be exempted, but the Deputy Collector refused the application, and dismissed the case. It was held that the Rajah was not bound to attend, and the suit was wrongly dismissed (1)

Exemption from arrest under civil process

(2) Where any matter is pending before a tribunal having jurisdiction therein, or believing in good faith that it has such jurisdiction, the parties thereto, their pleaders, mukhtars, revenue-agents and recognized agents, and their witnesses acting in obedience to a summons, shall be exempt from arrest under civil process other than process issued by such tribunal for contempt of Court while going to or attending such tribunal for the purpose of such matter, and while returning from such tribunal.

(3) Nothing in sub section (2) shall enable a judgment debtor to claim exemption from arrest under an order for immediate execution or where such judgment debtor attends to show cause why he should not be committed to prison in execution of a decree.

Exemption from arrest.—The privilege is not that of the person mentioned and for his personal benefit, but of the Court, and is conferred for the purpose of ensuring the due administration of justice (1) A case not governed by this section must be determined upon the principles of English law, on which this section rests (2) The validity of a commitment by a Court of inferior jurisdiction can be inquired into, and if it be found that a person was, when committed by such Court, entitled to privilege from arrest he will be released (3) Where plaintiff, a resident of Bengal, went to Madras on the 24th October to attend a case which, however, was adjourned for seven weeks on the 27th October, and while waiting in Madras for the suit to come on was arrested on the 10th November, he was directed to be released (4) In a suit under Chapter XXXIX of the last Code (see now Order XXXVII), when the defendant is not allowed to defend without leave, a defendant appearing in Court for that purpose is privileged (5) If there is no bona fides on the part of that person that his attendance is required he has no privilege (6) The privilege being that of the Court, he cannot, when arrested for contempt, claim privilege (7) The privilege attaches only when going to, or attending, or returning from a tribunal Therefore, where an insolvent who was wrongly imprisoned was arrested on his release from jail, it was held that he could not claim privilege (8)

"Tribunal" is a comprehensive term intended to cover Criminal as well as Revenue and Civil Courts, (9) Insolvency Courts, (10) and arbitrators (11) The words of the section are now as under the last Code not "from arrest under the Code," but from arrest "under civil process" (12)

136. (1) Where an application is made that any person shall be arrested or that any property shall be attached under any provision of this Code not relating to the execution of decrees, and such person resides or such property is situate outside the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court to which the application is made, the Court may, in its discretion, issue a warrant of arrest or make an order of attachment, and send

141. The procedure provided in this Code in regard to suits shall be followed, as far as it can be made applicable, in all proceedings in any Court of civil jurisdiction.

Miscellaneous proceedings. Procedure for miscellaneous proceedings.—The object of this section, which corresponds with sect 38, Act XXIII of 1861, is to make applicable to proceedings other than suits and appeals, the procedure, so far as it is applicable, which is adopted in suits and appeals. An appeal, however, is a substantive right and not a mere matter of procedure. This section, therefore, does not confer any right of appeal where it does not exist under the Code or any other law (1) The right of appeal must be given by statute conferring that right (2) If, however, a right of appeal is given by law, then the procedure in such appeal will be that laid down by the Code (3)

Proceedings other than suits.—The procedure applicable during the hearing of the suit until decree is provided for by the Code, as also that applicable in execution of or appeal from the decree. This section in the 1st Code did not on its true construction apply to execution of the decree, and was inapplicable to petitions for execution before, and independently of, the passing of sect 4, Act VI of 1892, which amended it by expressly declaring that it was not applicable to such cases (1) Prior, however, to the Amending Act it had been held, in a number of cases, that all execution proceedings should, for the purposes of this section be treated as miscellaneous proceedings (5)

All such cases, in so far as they proceed upon the ground that this section of the last Code was applicable to execution proceedings, must be considered both as overruled by the Privy Council and superseded by the Amendment of 1892 introducing the Explanation. Under the Code, as it stood after the introduction of the Explanation to s 107 of the last Code, this section does not apply to execution proceedings (1) The Amending Act, VI of 1892, by making this section inapplicable in proceedings for the execution of decrees, deprived the Civil Courts of the power to apply by analogy to proceedings for the execution of decrees, the procedure specifically prescribed for proceedings in suits at a stage prior to decree, and limited the procedure which could be applied under the Code in proceedings for execution to the procedure which is expressly, as in Chapter XIX of the last Code, or by implication, prescribed for proceedings for execution, or at the execution stage of a suit (2) The explanation has now been omitted, but presumably the law remains the same (3) It has recently been held by the Calcutta High Court that the explanation was only omitted because it had been rendered superfluous by the decision of the Privy Council in Thakur Prasad v Fakirullah (4)

Chapter XIX of the last Code did not, however, contain a complete procedure for proceedings in execution (5) and where this was the case the matter might have been disposed of under the inherent power of the Court (6) Thus it was held that a Court had inherent power, if not conferred by statute, to dismiss an application for execution when the applicant fails through his own laches to put the Court in a position to proceed with his application, as also to proceed forthwith to decide an application for execution of a decree on the materials before it, when time has been granted to a party to perform any act necessary for the further progress of the application, and that

The Court has, independently of the statutory power conferred on it, an inherent (2) power in this respect. It is both its right and duty to prevent its proceedings being made the cause of injustice and therefore to order the restitution of the thing improperly taken, and generally to restore the party to the position he would have occupied but for its erroneous order since reversed. The Codes, subsequent to that of 1859, provided for restitution, and the cases under them extended the operation of the words of the Statute as defined in the present amended section. The first clause of the section has been re-cast so as to bring it into closer conformity with the existing practice, and the second clause has been added.

It is immaterial whether the erroneous action of the Court was due to carrying into effect a wrong decree or whether it was due to execution proceedings wrongly conceived for the purpose of carrying out a right decree. In either case the Court, upon the error being ascertained, is bound, so far as it can, to place the aggrieved party back in his original position, and to take means not merely to restore to him the property of which he had been wrongly deprived, but also to give him compensation for such loss as he had thereby sustained. It is competent to the Court in the course of the execution proceedings to afford the aggrieved party this remedy in full (3). Where a claimant under the former section elected to put forward his claim to mesne profits in execution proceedings, and the claim was dismissed and he acquiesced in the dismissal and did not appeal, the order of dismissal was held a bar to further proceedings in respect of the same claim, so long as it remained unreversed (4).

The High Court of Calcutta has power under clause 15 of the Charter to order the Court of first instance to enforce restitution of the amount realized from the defendant in excess of the amount allowed by the Court of Appeal, and also to execute that part of the decree which awarded costs to the defendant (5).

The High Court made an order dismissing an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council with costs.—Held, that though there was no section in the Code directly applicable to the case, yet by analogy to this

The section was held applicable by analogy to proceedings before Courts of Revenue (2) It has been held that the principle of this section cannot be extended to the case of a decree which has been set aside under sect 108 of the last Code (now represented by O IX r 13), for such a decree cannot be revived by any subsequent proceeding (3)

"Decree."—The former section provided for restitution to which a party was entitled under a decree passed in appeal under Chapter XLI of the last Code It was held therefore not to apply where the benefit claimed was not granted in an appeal, but in a review setting aside the decree of the Appellate Court itself (4) But in such a case the Court might, in the exercise of its inherent power, or treating the application as one for execution of the decree passed on review, order restitution (5) Nor on the same grounds did the section apply where the decree under which the benefit was sought was an order of the Privy Council, (6) though the principle embodied in it did (7) The qualifying words "passed in an appeal under this Chapter" have been now omitted But it has been held that this section only applies to a case where a party is entitled to a benefit by way of restitution or otherwise under a decree passed in an appeal (8) The decree to be executed is the final decree whether that decree reverses, modifies, or affirms the decree of the lower Court (9)

"Varied or reversed."—As to the legal effect of such variance or reversal, see first paragraph

Money recovered under a decree or judgment cannot be recovered back whilst the decree or judgment under which it was recovered remains in force, but this rule of law rests upon this ground, that the original decree or judgment must be taken to be subsisting and valid until it has been reversed or superseded by some ulterior proceeding If it has been so reversed or superseded the money recovered under it ought certainly to be refunded The true question in such cases is, whether the decree or judgment under which the money was originally recovered has been reversed or suspended (10) The supersession to which their Lordships of the Privy Council were referring in this case must be a superseding by a decree of a Court which had competent jurisdiction to reverse the decree under which the money had been paid if it had been

- (b) for the restitution of any property taken in execution of a decree, or
- (c) for the payment of any money, or for the fulfilment of any condition imposed on any person under an order of the Court in any suit or in any proceeding consequent thereon, the decree or order may be executed against him, to the extent to which he has rendered himself personally liable, in the manner herein provided for the execution of decrees and such person shall for the purposes of appeal, be deemed a party within the meaning of section 4.

Provided that such notice in writing as the Court in each case thinks sufficient has been given to the surety

Execution against surety—This section corresponds with sect 204 of Act VIII of 1859, save that the portions in italics were added by the present Code and the last clause added by sect 253 of Act X of 1877. By the latter Act the section was limited to sureties who had become liable before the passing of a decree in an original suit. That limitation has been removed by the present Code.

The section applies to sureties in respect of applications for arrest and attachment before judgment under sects 479 [O XXXVIII r 2] and 484 [O XXXVIII r 6] (1). It does not prevent a surety being sued on his bond but gives an additional remedy against him (2). A surety objecting to his liability being enforced under this section on the ground that he became liable after the decree should object under sect 278 [O XXI r 3] and not under sect 311 [O XXI r 90] (3). Under the Code of 1877 and 1882, by which the operation of this section only affected sureties who had become liable before the passing of a decree in an original suit it was held that this provision did not apply to persons becoming sureties after decree (4) such as where after decree its terms were varied and provision made for its payment by instalments and for the payment of a portion of which a surety became liable under sect 214 of Act VIII of 1859 (5) but that it did apply to a decree of the PC and sureties for the costs of appeal, (6) and also sureties for the performance of any second appeal was filed (1) The Calcutta H C originally held that sureties for costs of appeal came within the section (2) but subsequently that execution could not issue under this provision against sureties for costs of appeal, (3) or against sureties after decree under sect 545 [O XLI r 5], (4) or against sureties under sect 546 [O XLI r 6], (5) but it could where an ex parte decree was set aside on condition the defendant found a surety for any amount subsequently decreed and another decree was passed after giving of security (6) and the limitation meant "before the decree in the original suit" which had not been made, but which would be made if the litigation proceeded and for the performance of which the surety became liable (6) The removal of these words of limitation and the inclusion of paragraph (b) now extend the operation of this clause to proceedings after decree See also notes to last section, 'Security for restitution'

"For the performance of any decree"—A surety pending partition by a bond undertaking to produce certain bonds in case the defendant failed to do so or to pay the amount mentioned therein is not liable for the performance of the decree, and his liability cannot be enforced in execution (7)

"May be executed"—The mode of enforcing payment is it has been held, by summary process in execution and not by separate suit (8) Likewise in cases of security for costs pending appeal (9) The decree against the judgment debtor does not impose a joint liability on the judgment-debtor and surety so as to enable the decree holder to take advantage of applications for execution against the judgment debtor alone to save limitation (10) Under this section the Court cannot declare a forfeiture in favour of the Government for the security money should be paid to the decree holder (11)

"Extent to which he has rendered himself personally liable"—A surety for the performance of a decree of the Court of first instance cannot have his liability increased by the decree of the Appellate Court though it may be reduced thereby His liability is not affected by a stay of execution being granted (12) If he made himself liable for the repayment of the principal sum awarded in a land acquisition case he cannot be made liable for interest and costs (13)

'Notice—It is immaterial whether the notice is given by the Court which passed the decree or by the Court to which it is sent for execution (14)

Appeal—An appeal, it has been held, lay from an order enforcing a claim against a surety under the former section (2)

Enlargement of time—In examining the provisions of the Bill, the attention of the Select Committee was directed to a number of clauses in which power was given to the Court to fix a period or to give or allow time for the performance of any act by a party. On the strength of the facts underlying reported decisions, the clauses were expanded to make it clear, in some cases that the period or time may be extended, and in others that this power of extension may be exercised even though the original period of time has expired. The Committee were of opinion that uniformity in this matter was of importance, because it might not be argued that the express conferment of these powers in certain cases negatives them by necessary implication in others. This difficulty has been sought to be removed by the general enactment contained in the present section. The principle embodied in this section was acted upon under the last Code in several cases, as under sect 549 of that Code (1) (now O XLI r 10) and under sect 54 where leave was obtained to amend plaint within a certain time (2). This section is the legislative recognition of the rule laid down in those cases (3). It cannot be taken to give a Court power to interfere with or modify its decree after an appeal has been filed against it (4). This section applies to cases in which the time fixed by the Code for doing some act is extended, but not to the extension of the time fixed by a mortgage decree for the payment of a prior mortgage (5). Under it the Court can extend the time for making an award, although the time has already expired (6). It has been recently held that this section does not entitle the Court to extend the time for payment of purchase money in pre-emption cases and that an order under it is not a decree under sect 2 nor appealable under sect 104 (7). But in another recent case in the Allahabad High Court where an application to set aside a decree had been granted on the condition of payment of a sum of money as damages by a certain date, and this condition had not been fulfilled, and the Court had then held that it had no jurisdiction to extend the time for such payment and had therefore proceeded to disallow the application to set aside the decree, it was held on appeal that an appeal lay from this order, and that the lower Court had such jurisdiction (8).

149. Where the whole or any part of any fee prescribed for Power to make up any document by the law for the time being in deficiency of court fees force relating to court fees has not been paid, the Court may, in its discretion, at any stage, allow the person, by whom such fee is payable, to pay the whole or part, as the case may be, of such court-fee; and upon such payment the document, in respect of which such fee is payable, shall have the same force and effect as if such fee had been paid in the first instance

Court fee—Sect 582A of the former Code which this section replaces, was added by Act VI of 1892, settling a matter in respect of which the case law was in conflict (9). It was applied in the last mentioned case which was held to come either under sect 5 of the Limitation Act or this section (10).

Repeal—The ordinary rule of construction of Statutes gives them a future operation only, unless the legislative intent appears clear from their terms that they are to have a retrospective operation. This presumption against retrospective operation does not, however, exist in the case of enactments relating to procedure, including pleadings, practice, and evidence. In fact, the general principle is that alterations in procedure are always retrospective in effect and apply to pending proceedings unless there be a declared intention to the contrary or good reason against it. When the effect of an enactment is to take away a right, then it does not prima facie apply to existing rights, but when it deals with procedure only, prima facie, it applies to all actions pending as well as future (2). There is, however, a distinction between "relief" and the mode or procedure for obtaining such relief. The "relief" remains unaffected by a change of procedure (3). The intention to take away a vested right (including a right of suit) is not to be imputed to the Legislature unless it is expressed in unequivocal terms (4).

(1) It was pointed out in District Munsif of Tiruvallur (in re) (F B), 37 M. 17 (1914), that this is an enabling (and not a repealing) section.

Scope of the English and Indian rules —Sects 26-32 of the last Code were first incorporated in Act X of 1877 from the various rules of Order XVI, framed under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873. Sect 26 was substantially the same with Rule 1 of the Order, as it stood at the time of the enactment of the Code, with the exception that that rule did not contain the words "in respect of the same cause of action". The rule was construed very broadly in the earlier cases, and held to justify a joinder of plaintiffs having distinct

causes of action, (1) and seeking wholly distinct reliefs, and not to import any limitation on the power of joinder (2) It was gradually narrowed in its application, and in Hannay v Smurthwaite, (3) Lord Bowen observed that it was not "the intention of this rule to allow writs to be issued under which any number of plaintiffs might join any number of causes of action or that a writ should be like an omnibus travelling on a certain route into which any number of persons may get as passengers for the journey" It was thus first restricted to cases in which relief was claimed in respect of the same subject matter, "as Order XVI dealing with parties, assumes an ascertained subject matter," (4) a principle recognized here in Haramoni Dass v Hari Churn Chowdhry (5) In accordance with this view, it was held in a number of cases that where the causes of action were separate and distinct they could not be joined in one action (6)

The English rule (7) was then altered in October, 1896, the alteration restricting it to cases in which the right to relief, alleged to exist, was "in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions," and where, if the persons joined brought separate actions, "any common question of law or fact would arise" Power also was expressly given in it to the Courts to "order separate trials, or make such other order as may be expedient," "if upon the application of any defendant it shall appear that such joinder may embarrass or delay the trial of the action"

The present English rule was therefore in widely different terms from sect 26 of the last Code A limited liberty of joining plaintiffs with separate causes of action is given The nature of the limitation is plain upon the face of the rule It was not thereby intended to allow any number of

but was under the Irish rule, which is in the same terms as the old English rule

From the foregoing it will appear that the English rule was wider than that laid down in sect 26 of the Code of 1882, which might generally be said to have represented the views commonly entertained by the English Courts in the middle period between the first promulgation of the rule and its amendment in 1896. While it is sufficient under the English rule that the right to relief should arise out of the same transaction, the Court being given a control over the exercise of such right, the right of joinder given by that section was only in respect of the same cause of action—a right which was still further limited by certain decisions owing to the interpretation placed upon the terms “cause of action” as to which, see post. The use of the term “cause of action” in the last Code gave rise to difficulty (vide post), the phrase therefore has been omitted and r 1 has been made to correspond with the present English rule as regards plaintiffs. It is in substantially the same terms as O XVI r 1 down to the words “would arise.” The portion in the English rule from “provided that” to “expedient” has been substantially embodied in r 2 and in O II r 6 post, and the portion as to judgment being given is embodied in O I r 1. The second paragraph of sect 26 of the last Code has not been re-enacted, as to which see notes to O I r 1. Rule 3 dealing with defendants corresponding with sect 28 of the last Code has been modified to bring it in conformity with r 1. The result is an extension of the right of joinder in conformity with the English law, the decisions under which will be applicable to this rule. The Select Committee said, “It is hoped that the multiplicity of suits will be further curtailed by the new provisions we have inserted to remove limitations which we regard as needless on the comprehensiveness of a suit, and by the wider powers of amendment vested in the Courts. An adequate check (see r 2) is provided by the power of a Court to interfere where embarrassment is likely to result.”

“Persons”—This and the following rules deal only with the joinder of parties, and have no reference to the joinder of causes of action. Sect 31 of the last Code, which provided that nothing in the section should be deemed

causes of action, (1) and seeking wholly distinct reliefs, and not to import any limitation on the power of joinder (2) It was gradually narrowed in its application, and in Hannay v Smurthwaite, (3) Lord Bowen observed that it was not "the intention of this rule to allow writs to be issued under which any number of plaintiffs might join any number of causes of action, or that a writ should be like an omnibus travelling on a certain route into which any number of persons may get as passengers for the journey" It was thus first restricted to cases in which relief was claimed in respect of the same subject-matter, "as Order XVI dealing with parties, assumes an ascertained subject matter," (4) a principle recognized here in Haramoni Dassi v Hari Churn Chowdhry (5) In accordance with this view, it was held in a number of cases that where the causes of action were separate and distinct they could not be joined in one action (6)

The English rule (7) was then altered in October, 1896, the alteration restricting it to cases in which the right to relief, alleged to exist, was "in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions," and where, if the persons joined brought separate actions, "any common question of law or fact would arise" Power also was expressly given in it to the Courts to "order separate trials, or make such other order as may be expedient," "if upon the application of any defendant it shall appear that such joinder may embarrass or delay the trial of the action"

The present English rule was therefore in widely different terms from sect 26 of the last Code A limited liberty of joining plaintiffs with separate causes of action is given The nature of the limitation is plain upon the face of the rule It was not thereby intended to allow any number of

relief as he or they may be entitled to, without any amendment But the defendant, though unsuccessful, shall be entitled to his costs occasioned by so joining any person

different plaintiffs to join in one action any number of separate and different causes of action, but it was intended merely to effect a modification of the old rule by which a limited liberty of joining plaintiffs with separate causes of action should be conferred. The conditions are, firstly, that the right to relief alleged to exist in each plaintiff should be in respect of, or arise out of, the same transaction, and secondly, that there should be a common question of fact or law (1). Where, however, there were in effect two plaintiffs and two causes of action not arising out of the same transaction, the case was held not to be within the present rule (2).

From the foregoing it will appear that the English rule was wider than that laid down in sect. 26 of the Code of 1882, which might generally be said to have represented the views commonly entertained by the English Courts in the middle period between the first promulgation of the rule and its amendment in 1896. While it is sufficient under the English rule that the right to relief should arise out of the same transaction, the Court being given a control over the exercise of such right, the right of joinder given by that section was only in respect of the same cause of action, a right which was still further limited by certain decisions owing to the interpretation placed upon the terms "cause of action," as to which see post. The use of the term "cause of action" in the last Code gave rise to difficulty (vide post), the phrase therefore has been omitted and r. 1 has been made to correspond with the present English rule as regards plaintiffs. It is in substantially the same terms as O XVI r. 1 down to the words "would arise." The portion in the English rule from "provided that" to "expedient" has been substantially embodied in r. 2 and in O II r. 6 post, and the portion as to judgment being given is embodied in O I r. 1. The second paragraph of sect. 26 of the last Code has not been re-enacted, as to which see notes to O I r. 1. Rule 3 dealing with defendants corresponding with sect. 28 of the last Code has been modified to bring it in conformity with r. 1. The result is an extension of the right of joinder in conformity with the English law, the decisions under which will be applicable to this rule. The Select Committee said, "It is hoped that the multiplicity of suits will be further curtailed by the new provisions we have inserted to remove limitations which we regard as needless on the comprehensiveness of a suit and by the wider powers of amendment vested in the Courts." An adequate check (see r. 2) is provided by the power of a Court to interfere where embarrassment is likely to result.

to enable plaintiffs to join in respect of distinct causes of action, has been omitted, all reference to cause of action being omitted from this section, and O II deals with the joinder of causes of action

Generally, as to parties, whether plaintiffs or defendants, every person can sue and be liable to be sued, and may thus be a party. The Code, which presupposes this rule, does not contain any provisions as to who may be parties. The portions of the Code which contain special provisions enacted on grounds of general interest, public convenience or policy, and, in the case of the incompetent, for their protection, refer generally only to the mode of suing or being sued in such cases. Every person who has a primary right or interest which has been violated in such a manner as to give him a secondary right to relief, may bring a suit as plaintiff against any person as defendant against whom an order for enforcement of that right is asked (1)

Subject to a few exceptions, the Common Law Courts were rigidly tied down to disposing of claims arising between exactly the same parties upon each side and in the same rights. They could give a judgment for A against C or against C, D, and E but they could not give relief of one sort against C and of another sort against D and E. Nor could they give relief of one kind to A and of another kind to B, or of one kind to A and B jointly and another to A separately. All the plaintiffs, if more than one, had to be jointly entitled and all the defendants jointly liable, with respect to every single matter upon which the Court was asked to adjudicate. In Chancery, on the other hand, the course was to deal with the controversy or transaction forming the subject matter of the action as a whole, and endeavour to do complete justice to it and for that object the Court insisted on all the parties interested in the subject matter being brought before it (2). The Chancery Rule has now been adopted as a general one by both English and Indian Courts. See r 10, clause (2) post. The same person cannot however, be both plaintiff and defendant in a suit unless he appears upon the record in different capacities (3).

In order to enable a person to sue, the right must be a real and existing one (4). The legal interest must be existing at the date of the institution of the suit, (5) which must be brought by the person who at the date of the suit, represents, so far as its subject matter is concerned the person with whom the original transaction took place (6). While the interest may be future it must be a present and existing one at the time of the suit. Merely "an expectation of the possibility of a future event which, if it occurs, may give birth to an interest," is not such an interest as will give a right of suit (1) The right must have come into existence before the date of the suit, and therefore a real owner's disclaimer, made in his deposition in a suit, has been held not sufficient to give a plaintiff a right to maintain a suit (2) The plaintiff must have a subsisting cause of action at the time of the institution of the suit, and he cannot take advantage of events that have happened subsequently (3) A suit by a person in respect of an act by which he may never be injuriously affected at all is premature (4) Leaving such general considerations, it may be stated that the question as to whether there is a right to relief in any case, and as to the person in whom that right is vested, and against whom it may be claimed and the nature of the relief, are questions of substantive law, and not part of the law of procedure, which may restrict or even extinguish such a right, but cannot create or extend it (5) This matter therefore does not come within the scope of this Commentary, and will not be dealt with by it (6) The rules relating to parties laid down by the Code refer not so much to the persons who may be parties as to their joinder as to defendants, vide post

"May be joined"—This section, under the Code of 1882, was held to be an enabling one, allowing a number of plaintiffs with the same right to relief to join in one suit instead of bringing separate suits. It did not say that all persons must be joined as plaintiffs when they had the same cause of action against the defendant (7) The present section is equally enabling. There is a distinction between a joint right and a right enjoyed in common with others. In the first case it may be necessary for all persons jointly interested to be joined as parties, and if they are not joined the suit may be bad for misjoinder (8) Where a person sues under a power of attorney, the principal's name should appear as plaintiff (9) It was held that Act X of 1859 allowed suits to be instituted by zemindars in their own names by their authorized agents, but the agent has no right to institute the suit in his own name. The zemindar's name should appear on the record as the plaintiff (10) It has been held the managing members of a Mitakshara joint family can sue without making the other members to sue, the right has been based partly on the fact that he is the transferee named in the registered instrument constituting the transfer, and on the principle that a contract can be enforced by the parties who have entered into it, partly on the ground that the defendant is estopped from raising the question, and partly on the view that the benamidar must be presumed to be suing on behalf of the beneficial owner, or, to put the same idea into other words, that the suit is really brought by the beneficial owner through, and in the name of, the benamidar. On the other hand, those rulings which are adverse (1) to the right of the benamidar to sue are mainly based on the ground that a suit cannot be maintained by any person who fails to prove, if his title is challenged, that he has a real interest of his own in the subject-matter of the suit (2). In some cases it seems to have been held that there is a distinction between suits on bonds and the like and suits for immoveable property in that in the former case a benamidar may, and in the latter may not, sue (3). But even in this the cases are not uniform (1). As to benamidar defendants, see post, and as to adding a benamidar as a party, r 10, post. to suits by a benamidar, who, as already stated, in some cases has been held not to occupy the position of a mere name lender, but a position analogous to that of a trustee holding the legal estate

This rule itself is not obligatory. It does not enact that any persons must join as parties. It does not even say that all persons who may be interested in the result of an action must necessarily be parties, (1) or that all persons must join as plaintiffs when they have the same cause of action against the defendant (2). Nor is it laid down anywhere else in the Code as to who must be joined as plaintiffs as distinct from those who may be so joined, and though some idea may be formed from the provisions of rule 10, yet they cannot furnish any general rule, as the first clause of the rule is restricted to the case of a bona fide mistake, and the discretion of the Court under the second clause is regulated by considerations different from those which must regulate the action of the plaintiffs themselves. The exact character of the right is immaterial (3) there being no distinction between legal and equitable rights, so far as relief in a particular Court is concerned.

R 1 was introduced to prevent a miscarriage of justice from want of parties and to enable persons aggrieved by the same act, or having the same right to relief, to join in one suit instead of bringing separate suits (4). The former section was not exhaustive in words, and did not say that only persons referred to in it might be joined as parties. The contrary might, no doubt, have been contended for, on the authority of the maxim, expressio unius personæ est exclusio alterius. On the other hand, it was held that there were clearly cases not falling within sects 26 and 28 of the former Code in which plaintiffs and defendants were and must be allowed to join in a suit. Thus persons having a successive interest were allowed to join as plaintiffs, (5) and in the case cited, in a suit by a daughter to set aside her mother's alienation of the property she held as a widow, the daughter's son was allowed to join as a co plaintiff, though he could not acquire the property in his mother's lifetime. And in some cases, persons were allowed to join merely ex abundanti cautela. Thus a receiver of an insolvent's estate may, after the insolvent's death, sue for everything due to his estate, but for greater security his executrix may be joined as a plaintiff (6). It is somewhat on a similar principle that, as a general rule, unless the policy of insurance has been legally assigned, and the assignment recognized by the insurance company or unless there has been an equitable assignment, and it can be shown that the holder of the policy has given value for it, the company is entitled to insist upon the legal representative of the assured being made a party to the suit for the amount due under the policy (7). Where however, there was no joinder of plaintiffs and causes of action it was held that there was nothing to necessitate the dismissal of the suit, but that the party should be put to election and the plaint amended (8).

"In respect of, or arising out of, the same act or transaction."—The words "in respect of the same cause of action" were added in the section of the last Code, as taken from the corresponding English rule, on account of its extreme breadth especially with reference to the decision in Beith v. Biscoe (4) in which eight persons were allowed to join in an action of libel, though no joint injury was shown. The section was held not to authorize the joinder of several plaintiffs in respect of separate causes of action (5). Under the last Code the exact effect of this rule, as depending on the identity of the "cause of action," had in the end to depend on the sense in which that expression was understood as used in this section. It is in its broadest sense taken to denote the conditions of the maintenance of an action, which generally consists of a right and its breach. Thus every cause of action presupposes the existence of a right, but it may be observed that an actual breach is not always necessary to constitute a cause of action. In some cases even an actual denial or refusal of the right is not necessary, and a suit may be brought simply on the basis of a right. Thus any person entitled to any legal character, or to any right as to any property, may institute a suit not only against any wrongdoer but also against every one interested in denying his right. The judgment of the Court, said: "The cause of action considered to both viz. the injury on their residence, the time when the injury complained of was committed, is one and the same, and the parties who committed the injury are also the same in both cases. No Court is ousted of its jurisdiction by the form of this action, and the irregularity, if any there be, does not injure the defendants, but is in their favour, inasmuch as they have to defend one instead of two actions, and justice can be done in the form in which the suit has been brought. The cause, the time, the place and the parties charged, being the same in both instances, the fact that plaintiffs have not a joint interest in the whole of the property plundered by the defendants is insufficient to put them out of Court" (6).

Cause of action is essentially different from subject matter, and the cause of action mentioned in sect. 26 in the last Code could not in any case be identical with the subject-matter, the identity of which was generally held to be the test of the application of the corresponding early rule of the English Supreme Court. The rule enacted in that section was narrower or broader according as the cause of action was understood in the broad or restricted sense above mentioned (1). Thus in the case (2) to which reference has already been made, Innes, J., observed that if some such words as "in respect to a particular subject matter" stood in place of "in respect of the same cause of action," the suit might not have been bad for misjoinder, but that "looking to the language of sect 26, and that of the latter part of sect 54 (of the former Code), as they jointly stand, it appears to us that the Code does not authorize the joining of plaintiffs in a suit in respect of distinct causes of action, in which they are not interested, and their interests are not merely conflicting but antagonistic." On the other hand, Tyrrell, J., in pointing out (3) the distinction between the cause of action and the subject matter, observed that "the plaintiffs had distinct and separate subject matters of action, to wit, their separate shares in the estate possessed for her life by the widow in alienating the property to N, to the jeopardy of the future rights of the plaintiffs as her reversionary successors to two thirds of the estate," and that "the plaintiffs therefore, though unconnected and separate in respect to the subject matters of the suit, were conveniently and rightly joined in vindicating the one interest common to them all, centreing in the main issue in the case, which was simply the nature and extent of the widow's dominion over the estate she admittedly possessed."

With a view to meet these various difficulties the Legislature has now omitted all reference to cause of action, and broadened the rule of joinder in accordance with the procedure of English Courts as to which vide ante

"Jointly"—Thus where a person sued his brothers for his share of their deceased father's estate but was transported for life, his sons were made co plaintiffs, on the ground that they would be co owners with their father in the ancestral estate, the High Court observing that "it is true they would be in law sufficiently represented by their father, but in fact they might not be represented effectually" (4).

"Severally."—In the Court of Chancery there were many cases in which co plaintiffs might severally be entitled to the same relief and might, before the Judicature Act, have been properly joined although their claim was neither joint nor alternative (5).

"In the alternative"—These words apply to cases in which there is a doubt as to who is the person entitled to sue upon the cause of action, as in the case of a sale to an agent, in which it may be doubtful whether the principal or agent should sue, or to cases where parties have different and conflicting interests in the same subject matter, and an act is committed which gives the same cause of action to either party, according to the eventual determination of the Court as to which of the two is entitled to recover

"We feel, no doubt, that the cases here suggested are among those to which the words 'in the alternative' are intended to apply, but what we feel some difficulty in understanding is as to how the principal and agent in the one case, and the parties having different and conflicting interests in the other, can be said to have the same cause of action, if that expression be taken to include the facts which constitute the right and its infringement, when the facts which constitute their rights must be different" (2) A plaint was held not to be bad because it prayed for a decree in favour of all the plaintiffs in certain allegations, or in the alternative, in favour of one of them, if other allegations should be proved (3)

Rule 3 Joinder of defendants—The third rule (4) (which [modified to meet the amendments made in r 1] corresponds with sect 28 of the last Code) is now substantially the same as r 4 of O XVI of the Rules under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873. The former section differed from it in that the Indian Legislature had introduced the words "in respect of the same matter". The English rule has been construed to embrace cases in which the cause of action is not the same (5) but not those in which the actions are based on entirely disconnected acts (6). The terms of the English rule were held to be wider and more general than the terms of the former section, (7) specially as its application was subject to ss 44, 45 of the former Code, dealing with the joinder of distinct causes of action. It was said with reference to the former Code that the Indian Legislature had in several ways shown that it did not intend to introduce here the wide latitude as to the joinder of parties allowed in English Courts (8). It thus altogether omitted to enact any provisions corresponding to rr 48-55 of the Order dealing with the third party procedure, and to rr 5 and 7 of the Order the former of which provides that "it shall not be necessary that every defendant shall be interested as to all the reliefs prayed for, or as to every cause of action included in any proceeding against him" English r 7 provides that "where the plaintiff is in doubt as to the person from whom he is entitled to redress, he may join two or more defendants, to the intent that the question as to which, if any, of the defendants is liable, and to what extent, may be determined as between all parties" These observations are no longer applicable The limiting words "in respect of the same matter" have been omitted, the English rr 5 and 7 have been incorporated in the present Code as rr 5 and 7 of the present Order, and power has been given to promulgate further rules The question of the joinder of defendants must now be dealt with on principles substantially the same as those which govern the English Courts in the same matter

Persons—See notes, p 513, ante In the under-mentioned case,(1) it was held that the rules by which the Poona Cantonment Committee was created did by implication, though not by express words, create the committee a corporation for the purposes of the conservancy of the cantonment It could therefore sue, and be sued, in its own name, on contracts entered into in its corporate character

"May be joined."—It was held that the provisions (2) of sect 28 also, like those of sect 26 of the last Code, were neither imperative (3) and obligatory, nor exhaustive The third rule is in the same terms as sect 28 of the Code of 1882, except as to the omission (which is of importance) of the words "in respect of the same matter," and the introduction of words which bring it into conformity with r 1 Additional power to make certain persons defendants is given expressly by r 6 and there are several other cases in which persons may, and in fact must, be joined as co defendants, though "any right to relief" is not alleged and cannot be alleged, to exist against them Reference may be made to the case of co sharers and others who ought to join as co plaintiffs and in their refusal to join as such, must be joined as co defendants There are, besides, persons against whom no right to relief exists, or is alleged to exist, and against whom no relief is or can be claimed, but who must be joined as co defendants for an effective and final determination of the suit or "whose presence before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the suit," and whom the Court may on that account, implead under r 10, and therefore it must be permissible for the plaintiff to implead as defendants in a suit In the case noted (4) the minor brother of a person who had entered into a contract was held to be rightly joined as a defendant, even though no decree for specific performance, such as was asked against the party to the contract, could be asked against him, the

whether the contract is of such a nature as to be binding on him" A leading instance of this necessity of joinder is found in the case of suits on mortgages, in which, on the grounds of equity and good conscience, it has long been considered a general rule in England as well as in India, that all the persons having an interest in the mortgaged property must be impleaded as parties (1) Unlike the right of joint contractees, when two or more persons make a joint promise, the promisee may, in the absence of express agreement to the contrary, compel any one of such joint promisors to perform the whole of the promise (2) And in suits on joint torts the tortfeasors may be sued jointly or separately at the option of the plaintiff, as their responsibility has been held to be not only joint, but several also (3) The distinction between this rule and r 10 is this the former refers to the action of a plaintiff at the time of presentation of the plaint in joining in the same suit as defendants, parties against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist, while the latter refers to the action of the Court at a stage subsequent to the presentation of the plaint in adding a party either as plaintiff or defendant, whose presence in the opinion of the Court is necessary (4)

The Code does not contain any express provision as to who should be considered necessary parties and what would be the effect of the omission of a plaintiff to bring on the record all necessary parties R 13, however by implication shows that an objection for want of parties is a valid objection to a suit or proceeding, and this section and r 10 by implication show who are to be deemed necessary parties Reading this and r 10 together it has been held that in order that a party may be considered a necessary party defendant, two conditions must be satisfied—first that there must be a right to some relief against him in respect of the matter involved in the suit, and second, that his presence should be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the suit (5)

In a recent case in the Allahabad High Court where mortgagees suing for recovery of the whole of the mortgage money by sale of the mortgaged property, omitted by an oversight to implead persons who owned a share in the property distinct from the shares owned by the other defendants it was held that only so much of the claim should be decreed as related to the latter shares (6)

It is necessary, however to concur in the language of Judge Story in which he states the impossibility of laying down any rules which shall be of universal application to the joinder of parties in equity observing that 'whether the common formulary be adopted that all persons materially interested in the suit, or in the subject of the suit, ought to be made parties, or that all persons materially interested in the object of the suit ought to be made parties, we express but a general truth in the application of the doctrine which is useful and valuable, indeed, as a practical guide, but is still open to exceptions and qualifications and limitations, the nature and extent and application of which are not, and cannot independently of judicial decision be always clearly defined" (1)

In a suit for declaration of right against a proprietor of an estate it is necessary that the proprietor himself be made a party to the suit, not his karindah only. A decree against the latter does not bind the former. The karindah may, of course, be retained as a party if it is intended to make a personal claim against him (2). As regards benamidar plaintiffs, see ante. A plaintiff is entitled to a decree against a benamidar defendant who has covenanted with him for the quiet enjoyment of property (3). In a suit for rent, defendant pleaded non liability on the ground that he was a benamidar and that the jote belonged to A. It was held that the Court was not competent to introduce A into the suit, against whom no relief had been sought by the plaintiff (4). Darputindar and Seputindar are proper, though not necessary, parties (5). In a suit for pre-emption the vendor is not a necessary party (6).

"Any right to relief."—It is not necessary that the relief to which the right is alleged to exist should be the same (7). Whether there is a right to relief in any case depends on the principles of the substantive law applicable, and reference is made to a few typical cases in the text book cited (8). In the under mentioned case, (9) the absent decree holders were held not to be merely parties against whom the auction purchaser defendants were entitled to claim some indemnity, but persons against whom a right to relief existed in the plaintiff if the suit was well founded.

"In respect of or arising out of the same act or transaction"—See notes, ante in particular note under same title and the next paragraph but one, post.

"Jointly, severally, or in the alternative"—The right to relief may exist jointly, severally, or in the alternative (10). These latter words refer

(10) For illustrations see notes to Annual Practice, 1914 Ord. XVI r. 1 and Hukm Chand, C. P. C. 418, 419. In the recent case of Muthappa Chetty v. Muthu Palani 27 M. 80 (1903) the plaintiff was held not entitled to sue jointly or in the alternative. But this case has not been followed in Nyathurai v. Santhu Meera, 31 M. 252 (1908)

primarily to cases like those of principal debtor and surety in which both are liable, but the creditor may, at his option enforce his right against either, though not against both. They are not restricted, however to those cases, and find application also where the plaintiff has no option and the liability depends on the facts as they may be found (1). Thus, in suits on contracts entered into by an agent and repudiated by the principal, both the principal and the agent may be joined as defendants with a claim for relief against them in the alternative (2). Where the claim was to have a mohurrari patta enforced as against the co-sharer granting it and the other co-sharers who repudiated it, and in the alternative to have the salami paid for the patta returned, it was held that the suit was in substance to enforce a contract to place the plaintiff in possession of the land under the patta and to declare his rights to it as against all the defendants, and to ask for compensation as against the defendant granting it and that such alternative claims might be allowed against one or more of the defendants (3). In a suit by a purchaser of land for arrears of rent against the tenant and the vendor, to whom the tenant alleged having paid the same, the two defendants were held to be properly joined, and a decree against the vendor was sustained on appeal (4). The plaintiff in a suit to recover money from certain persons alleged to have borrowed money from his agent, is entitled, when the alleged debtors deny the loan to make his agent a co-defendant and pray for a decree in the alternative against such agent (5).

Omission of the words "in respect of the same matter"—It was a subject of doubt under the Code of 1882 whether the use of the two expressions 'cause of action' and 'same matter' in sects 26 and 28 respectively of that Code, was intended to convey any distinction. As already pointed out, r 1 now omits all reference to cause of action. The subject will be found further discussed in the notes to O II r 3 dealing with the question whether that rule is a proviso to this. Whether the terms be synonymous or the latter more comprehensive than the former it was held that if there were but one cause of action the joinder of defendants was justified (6). On the other hand where there were separate causes of action against separate sets of defendants it was held that the trial could not proceed (7). The difficulty arose in cases where, though there may be strictly different causes of action the joinder was sought to be justified on the ground that there was yet 'the same matter' as to which see O II r 3, post. This raised the question whether assuming that the latter term was more comprehensive than "cause of action" sect 28 of the last Code (corresponding with rule 3 of this order) was not controlled by the section corresponding with O II r 3 post, (8) and that was the basis of the decision in a case (1) in which the Punjab Chief Court held that a suit by a person to set aside the attachments, made on different dates at the instance of different defendants, of various sums to which the plaintiff was entitled, was bad for misjoinder of causes of action, as also that an order merely for the distribution of assets among several persons under sect 295 of the former Code did not give a cause of action to a person considering himself entitled to the assets, and that a suit against those persons was not tenable, though it may be that where several decree holders combine in getting an order of distribution passed to the prejudice of another decree holder who is solely entitled to the money in the hands of the Court, the latter is entitled to have the question decided in a single joint suit against the former, as well as to recover the monies severally realized by them under the order, as was the case in No 90, P R, 1892, and in Gowri Prosad v Ram Ratan (2) In Gangabai v Bal, (3) 148 persons were joined as defendants, and there was held to be no misjoinder, as the order which the plaintiff sought to have reversed or modified was common to all the defendants, and the plaintiff's claim to relief, in so far as that order was concerned, existed against all the defendants jointly. In the under mentioned suit (4) the matter was held not to be the same, the matter in the one case being an alleged breach of contract by an agent of the firm, and in the other being the right of one partner in the firm as against the other partner to have accounts taken and the partnership wound up. Where a number of persons join fraudulently in combination do some act which leads to plaintiff's ouster from the full enjoyment of his proprietary right, they may all be joined in one suit (5). So, also in a suit for damages for assault against several persons, they may all be joined together, if it was simultaneously "made by parties proceeding together and acting in conjunction as to time, place, and assault," as the assault is in such a case only a single act (6). Where a suit was against two defendants uniting two causes of action, one of which was stated to have arisen out of a joint account of the defendants, and the other out of a transaction in which defendant No 1 alone was concerned, it was held that the right to relief against the defendants quoad the second branch of the claim could not be said to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative, in respect of the same matter, so as to justify the joinder in the one suit under the former section (7). A suit (8) against one defendant was for specific performance of a contract to sell land and against another for a declaration that he was not entitled to any charge upon that land, and Sargent, C J, held that the relief claimed against the two defendants could not be said to be in respect of the same matter, the right to relief against one defendant being in respect of the non fulfilment of the contract, and that against the other defendant in respect of a threatened disturbance of his possession. Where, on the other hand, both sets of creditors attached goods which the plaintiff claimed as his and the plaintiff had to establish his ownership as against both, it was held that the right to relief against all the attaching creditors was in respect of the same matter (1) The former section was held not to permit a tenant to bring a suit to have it determined which of two defendants, both of whom claimed rent from him, is his landlord, (2) the High Court observing in the case cited, that "the plaintiffs had no cause of action against the second defendant beyond that he demanded rent from them and obtained a decree for that rent," and "their only cause of action against the first defendant was that he had, on some other occasion, demanded and received rent from them," and "that cannot be considered the 'same matter' within the meaning of the section" In a recent case decided under the last Code it was broadly held that the general principle governing the joinder of defendants was, that there must be a cause of action in which all the defendants are more or less interested, although the relief against them may vary, but that separate causes of action against separate defendants quite unconnected not involving any common question of law or fact could not safely be joined in one action (3) In a recent case under the present Code it has been held that the first condition to be fulfilled before joining several persons as co-defendants is that the right to relief must arise against them all from the same act or transaction (or the same series of acts or transactions) and the second condition is that some common question of law or fact would arise against them if separate suits were brought (4)

a case (1) in which the Punjab Chief Court held that a suit by a person to set aside the attachments, made on different dates at the instance of different defendants, of various sums to which the plaintiff was entitled, was bad for misjoinder of causes of action, as also that an order merely for the distribution of assets among several persons under sect 295 of the former Code did not give a cause of action to a person considering himself entitled to the assets, and that a suit against those persons was not tenable, though it may be that where several decree holders combine in getting an order of distribution passed to the prejudice of another decree holder who is solely entitled to the money in the hands of the Court, the latter is entitled to have the question decided in a single joint suit against the former, as well as to recover the monies severally realized by them under the order, as was the case in No 90, P R, 1892, and in Gowri Prosad v Ram Ratan (2) In Gangabai v Bal, (3) 148 persons were joined as defendants, and there was held to be no misjoinder, as the order which the plaintiff sought to have reversed or modified was common to all the defendants, and the plaintiff's claim to relief, in so far as that order was concerned, existed against all the defendants jointly In the under mentioned suit (4) the matter was held not to be the same, the matter in the one case being an alleged breach of contract by an agent of the firm, and in the other being the right of one partner in the firm as against the other partner to have accounts taken and the partnership wound up Where a number of persons join fraudulently in combination do some act which leads to plaintiff's ouster from the full enjoyment of his proprietary right, they may all be joined in one suit (5) So, also in a suit for damages for assault against several persons, they may all be joined together if it was simultaneously "made by parties proceeding together and acting in conjunction as to time place, and assault," as the assault is in such a case only a single act (6) Where a suit was against two defendants uniting two causes of action, one of which was stated to have arisen out of a joint account of the defendants and the other out of a transaction in which defendant No 1 alone was concerned, it was held that the right to relief against the defendants quoad the second branch of the claim could not be said to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative, in respect of the same matter, so as to justify the joinder in the one suit under the former section (7) A suit (8) against one defendant was for specific performance of a contract to sell land and as against another for a declaration that he was not entitled to any charge upon that land, and Sargent, C J, held that the relief claimed against the two defendants could not be said to be in respect of the same matter, the right to relief against one defendant being in respect of the non fulfilment of the contract, and that against the other defendant in respect of a threatened disturbance of his possession Where, on the other hand, both sets of

be awarded, is a mere defect of form which is not fatal to the action (1) Where a person and the widowed daughter in law of his deceased father sued for pre-emption as joint co sharers, and the widow was found to be entitled only to maintenance and therefore not to be a co sharer, it was held that a decree could not be given to the other plaintiff without an amendment of the plaint, and as it was too late to amend the plaint, the suit was altogether dismissed (2)

"Respective liabilities"—The liabilities of all the defendants need not be the same, and there will be no misjoinder if some of the defendants are found not to be liable Thus, if in a suit against six persons for possession of a certain share of land and in the alternative for its rent, the fact that only one of the defendants is found to be in possession and that a portion of the claim for rent is not sustainable against another defendant, is not a ground for dismissing the suit altogether for misjoinder of defendants (3) An insolvent and his trustees have been sued together, though their liabilities were not the same (4) It was held there was no misjoinder in a suit against two agents one of whom was liable to account for twenty years and the other jointly liable with the former for the last two years of this period (5) The suit, however, has been held to be bad where the plaintiff has united different causes of action in one suit against different defendants who were not jointly liable in respect of each and all of such causes of action (6) Where the defendants combined to keep the plaintiff out of his property it was held they were properly joined (7) In the under mentioned case the right to relief, so far as regards the first and second sets of defendants, was a right to relief against them severally but the cause of action arose out of the single subject matter, which formed the subject of the plaintiff's original mortgage (8) Where there is no misjoinder of causes, a plaintiff is permitted to bring a single suit against a number of persons, even though some of them may not be interested in the entire subject matter of the suit (9) The general principle that the difference of the extent of the defendant's liabilities does not prevent a joinder of them in a suit is specially applicable in cases in which several properties comprised in an estate are alienated to different persons, and all such alienees are allowed to be joined in one suit (1) An unsuccessful defendant may be ordered to pay the costs of the successful one (2)

Costs—The second paragraph of sect 26 of the last Code dealt with the question of costs. The words "entitled to his costs," etc., in that section, referred to the joining of persons as plaintiffs, as mentioned in the first sentence of the section. The words in the corresponding English rule were held to refer to "the persons who bring the action, who act by one solicitor, and who speak of themselves as the plaintiffs, though they allege that each of them has a separate right" (3). If one or some of the plaintiffs are successful, and the other or others unsuccessful, the successful were held liable to pay to the defendant the costs of the unsuccessful plaintiff, (4) and to recover from the defendant the whole of his general costs of the action, (5) Esher, M R, observing in the case cited, that the last sentence of the section as to costs applies "as between a plaintiff who has succeeded in the action and a defendant who has failed." And it is a settled rule of English practice that the costs occasioned to the defendant by the joining of the unsuccessful plaintiff may be deducted from those payable by the defendant to the successful plaintiff (6). The Select Committee in their report stated that they understood that in practice the provisions of sect 26 of the last Code relating to costs was not operative in the Mofussil, and that part of the section has therefore not been reproduced.

- 29.] 6. The plaintiff may, at his option, join as parties to the same suit all or any of the persons severally, or jointly and severally, liable on any one contract, including parties to bills of exchange, hundis and promissory notes.

Joinder of parties in same contract.—This rule, which corresponds with sect 29 of the last Code, is the same as r 6 of O 16 of the English rules, except that the word "hundis" has been added. It is a modification of the general principle which required that wherever more than one person was liable to contribution to the plaintiff's demands, they should all be made parties to the suit (1). The word "contract" is, however, to be construed strictly, and a liability to account under a will is not a liability under a contract (2). In Baldeo Prasad v Grish Chundar, (3) the endorsee of a cheque sued the endorser for a duplicate or the amount of the cheque said to have been lost and the High Court ordered the plaint to be returned so that the drawer might be joined as a defendant, but this was on the ground that a duplicate cheque could not be given by the endorser without the co operation of the drawer. The rule is merely an enabling one, and does not prevent the joinder in any case in which it would otherwise be proper. Thus it has been held that the drawer and the acceptor of a bill of exchange may be joined as co defendants in a suit brought by the holder (4). When two out of three defendants liable for a joint debt had promised to pay separately it was held that the suit could proceed against them only (5).

7. Where the plaintiff is in doubt as to the person from whom he is entitled to obtain redress, he may join two or more defendants in order that the question as to which of the defendants is liable, and to what extent, may be determined as between all parties

"Is in doubt"—This rule which is new, is taken from O 16, r 7 of the English rules with some slight verbal modifications. It has been held under that rule that while alternative relief of different kinds may be given against alternative defendants, (6) it does not enable a plaintiff to bring separate causes of action against different persons in one action (1) The costs of a successful defendant sued in the alternative may be ordered to be paid by the unsuccessful co defendant (2)

8. (1) Where there are numerous persons having the same interest in one suit, one or more of such persons may, with the permission of the Court, sue or be sued, or may defend, in such suit, on behalf of or for the benefit of all persons so interested But the Court shall in such case give, at the plaintiff's expense, notice of the institution of the suit to all such persons either by personal service or, where from the number of persons or any other cause such service is not reasonably practicable, by public advertisement, as the Court in each case may direct

(2) Any person on whose behalf or for whose benefit a suit is instituted or defended under sub rule (1) may apply to the Court to be made a party to such suit.

Scope of Indian and English rule—It is a general rule that all persons interested ought to be made parties to a suit howsoever numerous they may be, so that the Court may be enabled to do complete justice by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested and that the orders of the Court may be safely executed by those who are compelled to obey them, and future litigations may be prevented, also that a person who ought to be, but is not, a party to a proceeding is not ordinarily bound by any decree or order passed therein This rule yields to the exigencies of particular cases, and there are well established qualifications to it, such as the power of the Court under this rule to make a representative order (3)

This rule, which corresponds with sect 30 and a portion of sect 32 of the last Code,(4) is the same as the English r 9 of O 16, except that in the present rule the word "suit" is substituted for 'cause of matter' and it is here necessary to obtain permission of the Court for suing also, while under the English rule the permission is required only for defending a suit on behalf of others The second sentence also has been added (5) The effect of the statutory rule is merely to give Legislative sanction to the practice which long prevailed in the Equity Courts of England The great risk from abatement, and the inconvenience and the expense involved in a great number of persons being parties, led those Courts to recognize the representative system as it was not inconsistent with general principles that certain judicial proceedings taken by or against,

In the first place, the rule does not constitute but presupposes the existence of a right to sue, without which it can find no application (2) The rule deals with procedure only, and does not affect substantive rights (3) In the under mentioned case, (1) Shephard, J, referring to the case of Jan Ali v Ram Nath, (5) observed that "it seems to have been considered that the granting of leave under the section would have made up for the insufficiency of interest disclosed in the plaint," but added that "with great deference, that view appears to be incorrect"

Nextly, assuming that a right of suit exists under the substantive law, the rule is merely an enabling one, allowing a suit to be instituted under certain circumstances by some of the persons interested on behalf of all (6) Beverley, J, observed, in the case first cited, that "there are no words in the section to the effect that where persons have the same interest in a suit they are debarred from suing either jointly or severally unless they obtain the permission of the Court to sue on behalf of all the persons similarly interested," and "the section does not forbid them from suing in their own right, it merely says that if they desire to sue on behalf of others, they must obtain the permission of the Court" Ameer Ali, J, after observing that "that section is an enabling section, and must be read in conjunction with Explanation V to sect 13" (corresponding with sect 11), said "The effect of sect 30, therefore to my mind is that unless such permission is obtained by the person suing or defending the suit, his action has no binding effect upon the persons whom he chooses to represent Where there is a joint right it may be necessary for all persons jointly interested to be joined as parties, and if they are not joined the suit may be bad for misjoinder In order to prevent the record from being unnecessarily encumbered by many names, sect 30 allows one or more persons having a joint interest to sue or defend with the authorization or permission of the Court on behalf of all The section, in fact, embodies a rule of convenience based on reason and good policy but in my opinion it was not intended to take away, nor does it take away any right It seems to me that sect 30 does not give any warrant for the contention that because a person has a right in common with others he may not maintain an action for the establishment or enforcement of his own right There is no obligation on him to sue or defend on behalf of others, and if he does not seek any relief on behalf of those who have an interest in common with him or to bind them by his action, there is nothing in the section or in any other law to debar him from maintaining the action Even if he were to bring a suit on behalf of himself and the others he may choose to go on with the action on his own behalf, and would be entitled

“Numerous.”—There is no absolute rule as to what number will be considered sufficient, though in the case mentioned (5) twenty persons were not considered sufficiently numerous. A question as to the applicability, however, of the rule has arisen where the parties are numerous. This rule, as already observed, deals with procedure only and does not confer substantive rights of suit. Under the ordinary rule of the substantive law no action is maintainable by a private individual for an infringement of the rights of the general public, unless he has suffered special damage (6). As this rule presupposes a right to sue it gives none where there is otherwise none. This rule does not therefore allow one or more persons to sue on behalf of the general public (7). In the case therefore of an infringement of a right of the public at large no suit will be under this section, or at all, unless on proof of special damage, in which case either one person sues in respect of his individual right, and the rule does not apply, or if he should sue on behalf of others similarly specially injured, he sues on their behalf and not on behalf of the general public (8). In the case cited (9) it was held that a suit could not be brought on behalf of a portion (10) of the general public, such as the Hindu community, as the entire Hindu community was incapable of ascertainment, and that the words “numerous parties” (in the former section) meant parties capable of being ascertained, as “seems clear from a reference to the provisions for service of notice upon all such parties” (11). No doubt the rule is often applied where the parties though numerous can be definitely ascertained, as in the case of

creditors,(1) legatees,(2) members of a samaham,(3) debenture holders, bond holders, club, and the like (4) The rule, however, is not limited to such cases. The decision of the Madras High Court,(5) which was cited in the Calcutta case,(6) is not an authority for the principle laid down by the latter. The Hindu community,(7) no more than the Mahomedan community,(8) is not the general public but only a particular portion, though it may be a large one of the population of this country, which consists of various races and creeds (9). Next, the observation of the Madras High Court that the section is "rather designed to allow one or more persons to represent a class having special interests," seems to show that the decision in the Calcutta case is incorrect even according to the Madras decision which it approved (10). Further, the provisions of the rule as to advertisement appear to have been overlooked and, lastly, other decisions are not consistent with it. One or more persons have been allowed to represent classes of the general public having special interests, though they cannot sue on behalf of the whole general public. So suits have been allowed by one or more persons on behalf of others of a sect,(11) caste,(12) worshippers at a mosque,(13) parishioners of a church,(14) fellow villagers,(15) or class of villagers (16). All these cases are suits on behalf of a defined class, though that class is composed of a more or less "indefinite number of persons" (17). Thus in one of the cases cited (18) two Brahmins were permitted to sue to enforce a trust for the benefit of Brahmins generally, of whatever kind or sect or place. In many if not in all of these cases if the matter is looked at strictly, it cannot be said that all the parties are capable of being ascertained so that a notice might, if required, be served on each and all of them. An inquiry made for such a purpose would have no abiding result. While it was being made, and after it had been made its subject matter would constantly be liable to change, owing to deaths and births, new arrivals and departures of the members of the class on whose behalf the suit was sought to be instituted. The limitation of this rule, therefore, to cases where the parties can be ascertained has been dissented from in a case in which it was held that the Satchari caste of Chatra was a defined class of the general public and that the suit had been properly instituted under the former section, whether all the members of such caste were or were not capable of being so accurately ascertained as that notices could, if required, be served on each and all of them (1).

To sum up, no suit can be brought on behalf of the general public. A suit may lie on behalf of a class of the general public having special interests, though that class may consist of a more or less indefinite number of persons, as also on behalf of numerous parties who can, in the strict sense, be accurately ascertained, as in the case of a suit by a legatee on behalf of all other legatees.

"Persons"—"Parties" was the word used originally in the corresponding rule of the English law, but it has since been altered to "persons". In Oriental Bank Corporation v Gobind Lall Seal, (2) it was contended, without success, that the word "parties" did not mean persons in the position of creditors, but "only parties necessary to the suit without whose presence on the record the suit would be defective," and Norris J, observed that the word "parties" meant persons, and "that the provisions would be unintelligible unless the word received that meaning". In accordance with this decision the word "persons" has been substituted for the word "parties" in the former Code as being the more appropriate expression. As a result of the representative system enacted in this rule, the parties represented by another, though interested, will not be parties to the suit, (3) but they can apply to be made parties, and if any person thinks that he is not properly represented by the plaintiff, as holding different views from his, he should apply to be made a party personally (4). It has been held that it is undesirable that individual creditors should be added as parties in an administration suit, unless they can show strong reason to think that the person who has filed the suit on their behalf is not conducting it properly (5). Though the effect of an order under this rule is that the parties, who have obtained permission to sue as representatives, have the conduct of the suit on behalf of all those they purport to represent, yet if any person is dissatisfied with the conduct of the suit or deems that he is not properly represented, it is open to him to make an application to secure his views being properly represented and if necessary to take the conduct of the suit out of the hands of those who by the permission of the Court represent him (6).

A represented person should not be made a party simply for the security of the defendant's costs, as the Court may order security for them otherwise (1)

"Same interest."—The word "interest" in the corresponding English rule was formerly held to denote "beneficial proprietary interest." (2) But it has been more recently held that the rule is not confined to such cases, and that, given a common interest and a common grievance, a representative suit is in order if the relief sought is in its nature beneficial to all whom the plaintiff proposed to represent (3) In the first of the cases last cited, it was held that the plaintiffs had a common right, which was invaded by a common enemy, and that they were entitled to join in attacking the common enemy in respect of the common right, although inter se they might have different rights The identity of interest in a suit depends directly on the identity of the relief sought and only indirectly on the right on the basis of which the relief is sought The rule is therefore independent of the joint, common, or several character of the right sought to be enforced, except so far as that character may determine the nature of the relief sought Whether a right is "joint," or "common" or "several," the rule is equally applicable or not applicable according as the relief sought is, or is not, the same in any of those cases (4) Where there is a joint right all interested must sue, or some one or more may sue on behalf of the rest Where the right is common or several, a complete option is given Separate suits may be prosecuted by each of the persons interested, or if numerous parties possess the same interest, some one or more may sue on behalf of the rest under the terms of this rule The matter has been well summarised by Shephard, J (5) who said, "The rule of the Court of Chancery, to which the section owes its origin, appears to have been made applicable in two classes of cases There are the cases in which the number of persons claiming concurrent interest in the subject matter and therefore, according to strict rule, necessary (6) parties to the suit, is so large that they cannot all be conveniently joined with any chance of bringing the suit to a conclusion And there are the cases in which numerous persons have distinct but similar rights which might be prosecuted in distinct suits For instance there is the case of numerous creditors of the same person, or that of many persons claiming a right of common or right of fishing in respect of the same property (1) As already stated, the rule is an enabling one, and therefore a person whose individual several right has been infringed may sue alone. But he may also sue on behalf of himself and others, whose individual rights have been infringed, if they have the same interest with him within the meaning of the rule (2) Co sharers in joint property have, however, not necessarily the same interest in a suit relating to that property. In Hira Lal v Bhairon (3) the suit was by one co sharer against three other co sharers to prevent them from usurping exclusive possession of the joint land, and it was held that the suit would lie, and that the corresponding section to this rule did not apply to it, as though the remaining co sharers would in such a case have co parcenary or joint interest with the plaintiff in the subject-matter of the suit, they would not have the same interest in the suit, and would not be so "interested" in like manner as he was, as it might be "indifferent to them whether the defendants usurped exclusive rights in the shamilat, or it may be inconvenient to them at this moment to assert their own rights" And this decision was cited with approval in Dhunput Singh v Pareshnath Singh, (4) in which it was held that the other persons of the Situmbari sect were similarly interested in suing, though the Digambari Jains were not similarly interested. It was held by a full Bench of the High Court in Vasudevan v Sankaran (5) that sect 30 (corresponding to this rule) has no application to suits to which a Karnatan is a party in a representative capacity, Shephard, J, pointing out that the interest of the Karnatan "with his right of management and possession and his obligation to maintain the junior members, is surely not identical with the interest of a junior member who has a claim for maintenance only" It has been held that a suit is maintainable under this rule where a right to a village pathway is the subject matter of litigation, even in the absence of special damage (6) Where a party to a suit represents others under this rule, the decree is binding on those he represents, but when such a party disobeys an injunction (which is personal in its nature) and is proceeded against in execution for that disobedience, an order in such proceedings will not be binding on those whom he was allowed to represent (7)

must be dismissed,(1) and that the permission must have been obtained prior to the institution of the suit, and cannot be given at the hearing nunc pro tunc (2) A Full Bench of the Bombay High Court, however, has held that per mission may, as under the old Chancery practice in England, be given at any time, as it does not involve a question of jurisdiction, and is analogous to that of adding parties, and where a suit is defective as to parties the requisite parties can be added after the suit is filed (3) The decision has been followed by the Allahabad High Court (4) and the Madras High Court, (5) the latter also holding that where leave had been given after the commencement of the suit it was immaterial that an application to sue had been previously refused. The permission need not be in express words (6) In the case cited, Petheram, C J, and Ghose, J, observed "that if permission can be well gathered from the proceedings of the Court in which the suit was instituted, the Appellate Court ought to hold that such permission was really granted" The Court should exercise a judicial discretion in granting the permission to some definite person or persons, (7) and permission should be given only if the number of persons suing or defending is so large as will fairly and honestly try the legal right in dispute, (8) and every right adverse to the opposite party would be represented (9)

"On behalf"—The first part of the rule implies that the plaintiff there contemplated wishes to sue on behalf of other persons similarly interested in suing, they also wishing the same (10) In a recent case the Court referring to this observation, though not deciding the point, observed that as the plaintiff sued on behalf of the sect of Digambara Jains, this section prima facie applied but that there was nothing to indicate that the other members of the sect wished to bring the suit (11) The present section includes also the words "or for the benefit of" "On behalf" will only be so far as the "same interest" is concerned Thus, an order appointing a person to represent a class such as the next of kin does not affect one of the next of kin who has a distinct and independent right, (12) nor will it affect the class except as regards the property which he can legally

Notice—The notice must include the names of the persons who have been permitted to represent others, so that the persons interested may have an opportunity of knowing who have been selected to represent them (3) It is the duty of the Court to cause service of the notices or advertisements to be published under this rule If a plaintiff omits to move the Court for that purpose, his suit should not be dismissed on account of the failure of the Court to perform this duty (4)

English and Indian rules compared—This rule reproduces sect 19 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1860, and is now substantially the same with the first sentence of O XVI r 11, as it appeared after the revision of the rules in 1883 Following the English rule the rule has now been amended to include the case of non joinder also The rest of Order XVI r 11 corresponds with portions of the following rule

Misjoinder—Misjoinder is of several kinds (5) (a) Of plaintiffs This is dealt with by this rule, which deals with misjoinder of parties only There is no misjoinder where a plaintiff is entitled to recover all the estate sued for, and the name of another person is added merely as a matter of caution (b) (b) Of defendants This is also covered by the present rule (c) Of causes of action, or subjects of suit This class of misjoinder is dealt with by O II rr 3-7, post (d) Of plaintiffs and causes of action This was unphiedly forbidden by the second paragraph of this section in the last Code read with sect 26 of that Code (7) But see now post, "Distinct causes of action" (e) Of defendants and causes of action, or multifariousness strictly so called, that is, when one of the defendants is not interested in the whole of the relief sought See notes to O II, post

Where a plaintiff alleging himself to be entitled on the death of a Hindu widow to the possession of certain immoveable property, upon the death of such widow brought a joint suit against three sets of defendants, being persons to whom the widow in her lifetime had by separate alienations transferred separate portions of the property claimed Held, that such suit was bad for misjoinder of both parties and causes of action, and that sect 578 of the former Code could not be applied to cure the defect. but the plaintiff was allowed on terms to withdraw his suit as against two out of three sets of defendants with liberty to bring a fresh suit on the same cause of action (1) But see now sect 99, which is amended to include misjoinder

Nonjoinder—Even before the revision of the rules in 1883, the Court notwithstanding the absence of these words, treated the English rule as comprehending cases of “non joinder” as well as “misjoinder” (2) It was said that it could not be legitimately inferred from the provision as to misjoinder that the suit “shall be defeated by reason of non joinder of plaintiffs who ought to sue,” (3) and that a similar construction to that put upon the English rule should be followed here, the power given by the last clause of the first paragraph of this section in the old Code being held to amount to a direction to the Court not to dismiss a suit on the ground either of misjoinder or of non joinder (4) The amendment of the section now makes this point clear The English rule, which corresponds with this and the next rule was intended to do away with pleas in abatement and demurrers for want of parties (5) The present remedy is to apply for the joinder of the party The rule as to parties is for the purposes of justice, and the Court has ample powers under rule 10 to add parties whenever they ought to have been joined, or whenever without them the Court cannot deal with the matter in controversy so far as regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it (6) So far as the initial stage of the suit is concerned, there can be no question If an objection is taken by the defendant to the non joinder of a necessary party, the Court will not dismiss the suit if an application be made to it by the plaintiff to add that party, but will add the party and proceed with the suit (7) There is, however, this distinction between the two cases, that misjoinder of plaintiffs can never subsequently be fatal to a suit, though non joinder of a plaintiff in certain cases may (1) An objection may be taken to misjoinder and no notice may be taken of it. If there has in fact been a misjoinder, the suit will be dismissed as regards the party misjoined and the Court will deal with the rights of the other parties (2) Where, however, it is the right of the defendant if he takes the objection in proper time to insist upon all of certain persons being joined as plaintiffs; and if after the objection has been raised the plaintiff proceeds with the suit without taking steps to add the person or persons whose non joinder has been objected to and the Court finds that the objection is well founded, the suit must be dismissed (3) A suit may be dismissed for non joinder of persons against whom the plaintiff is entitled to relief in respect of the matter involved in the suit and whose presence is necessary in order to enable the Court to adjudicate upon all the questions involved in the suit (4) Apart from cases where joinder of parties is required under the Common Law, the effect of non joinder must also be considered with reference to any special statutory requirements which may exist on the subject. Thus, sect 85 of the Transfer of Property Act required that all persons having an interest in the mortgaged property should be joined, provided that the plaintiff has notice of such interest. This section is now incorporated as r 1 of O XXXIV. As to the effect of non joinder of persons interested in mortgaged property, see the cases undermentioned (5)

The principle of this section should be applied, so far as may be, by Appellate Courts also (6) In the case cited, the suit was for possession of a small corner of gorah land, which had been awarded to the plaintiff on a partition of the whole culturable land of the village. Only eleven of the proprietors were made defendants by the plaintiff, but the Original Court impleaded the entire proprietary body as co defendants. On appeal, the plaintiff again impleaded only eleven, contending that he could obtain full relief from them. The lower Appellate Court dismissed the appeal for the non joinder of the other proprietors. The Chief Court held the dismissal to be wrong and observed that the lower Appellate Court should either have decided "the appeal as between the parties before it, leaving with the plaintiff the risk of not having the other defendants before the Court," or, under O XLI r 20 made them respondents. In a recent appeal under sect 15 of the Letters Patent where in a suit instituted under the last Code, a co sharer had omitted to join parties who were apparently his co-sharers, it was held by the Calcutta High Court that the suit was bad for misjoinder since it was not under this rule but under sect 31 of the last Code, which did not contain a saving clause in favour of non-joinder (1)

"Defeated"—If there is such a misjoinder as to cause inconvenience and expense to the defendant, the suit should not be tried, but the proper course will not be to dismiss the suit, but to reject the plaint (2). Where there is no misjoinder of parties, but misjoinder of causes of action against the same defendant the causes not triable conveniently should be tried separately or excluded under O II r 6 (3). Where, however, there was misjoinder both of parties and causes of action, it was held that the suit should be dismissed (4).

Distinct causes of action—The second paragraph of this section under the last Code ran "Nothing in this section shall be deemed to enable plaintiffs to join in respect of distinct causes of action". It was not to be read as if it ran "Nothing shall be deemed to enable a plaintiff to join distinct causes of action". This was clear from the provisions of sect 45 of that Code, and O II r 3 of this which distinctly enable a plaintiff to join in the same suit several causes

Both the remaining heir and the transferees from him were made defendants. Held that there was no misjoinder of parties or of causes of action in such a suit (6).

The second paragraph was held not to apply where plaintiffs joined in respect of the same cause of action, as, for instance where a widow and the son adopted by her to her deceased husband sued to have the deceased's property declared theirs, the widow admitting the adoption and there being no antagonism between the claims of the two (1) A Mahomedan widow and her daughter instituted a suit against her husband's heirs for their shares in the husband's property, the widow alleging that a certain conveyance and a release which she was induced to execute under a false representation were invalid, and the daughter relying on this and on the further allegation that the widow had no power in any case to execute the release so far as the daughter's share was concerned. For defendants it was contended that the suit was bad for misjoinder and multifariousness, but it was held that neither of these contentions was good. The plaintiffs sought their share of the family property and claimed that their shares had been improperly dealt with. It was true that the defendants set up different claims to the property, but they were all based on the validity or otherwise of the release (2).

This paragraph no longer appears in the present rule, doubtless because of the amendments made in O I r 1. Probably the position now is that where two or more plaintiffs base their claims to relief on a common ground within the meaning of that rule claims may be united in the same suit.

10. (1) Where a suit has been instituted in the name of the Suit in name of wrong person as plaintiff or where it is doubtful whether it has been instituted in the name of the right plaintiff, the Court may at any stage of the suit, if satisfied that the suit has been instituted through a bonâ fide mistake, and that it is necessary for the determination of the real matter in dispute so to do, order any other person to be substituted or added as plaintiff upon such terms as the Court thinks just.

(2) The Court may at any stage of the proceedings either Court may strike out or add parties. upon or without the application of either party, and on such terms as may appear to the Court to be just, order that the name of any party improperly joined, whether as plaintiff or defendant, be struck out, and that the name of any person who ought to have been joined, whether as plaintiff or defendant, or whose presence before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the suit, be added.

(3) No person shall be added as a plaintiff suing without a next friend or as the next friend of a plaintiff under any disability without his consent.

(4) Where a defendant is added, the plaint shall, unless Where defendant added, plaint to be amended. the Court otherwise directs be amended in such manner as may be necessary, and amended copies of the summons and of the plaint shall

Sub Rule (1) English rule and Indian rule compared—This rule is an amalgamation of sects 27, 32 and 33 of the last Code, and the first sub-rule corresponds with sect 27 of the old Code (1) The latter, as originally enacted, was the same as r 2 of O XVI of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, with the exception that the terms in which the substitution or the addition of the plaintiff could be ordered were not required to be "just" but such as 'the Court might think just' Act XII of 1888 inserted further in this section the words 'at any stage of the suit,' and "with his or their consent," the former evidently to avoid the construction placed on the section by Pontifex, J (2) and the latter with reference to the construction placed on the English r 2 in which a person was not allowed to be joined as a plaintiff without his consent (3) This is now provided for by the third sub-rule Sir Arthur Wilson in explaining the effect of the first sub-rule says (4) It has often happened that actions have been inadvertently brought by the wrong person—as by cestui que trust, instead of trustee, by mortgagor instead of mortgagee Often the same mistake has been made where it was a matter of real difficulty to say which of two persons ought to sue—as in the case of contracts made by agents, as to which it is often a question of much nicety to determine who ought to sue Though the Common Law Courts had the largest powers of adding parties or amending misdescriptions of parties, they had no power to substitute one plaintiff for another such as this rule confers (5) The same difficulty was experienced in British India as the Courts had no power here also to substitute any person's name for the plaintiffs (6) The rule, however, does not give a Court unlimited power to remodel the proceedings (7) It has been held that the power given under this rule is not excluded in cases where the person originally suing has no right to institute the suit (8)

"Suit"—In the undermentioned case (9) Bamerjee J held that this word did not include an appeal, sect 582 of the former Code (corresponding with sect 107 of this) not making all the provisions applicable to suits applicable also to appeals Maclean CJ, expressed a grave doubt whether this word and "plaintiff" could be read as including an "appeal" and "appellant" These doubts were, however, based on the wording of sect 582 The drafting has now been altered, the first portion of sect 582 standing by itself as sect 107, and the latter portion being represented by O XXII r 13 In an early case, (1) the High Court, in a special appeal, allowed the name of the real persons to be substituted for that of the receiver, who had by mistake brought the suit on their behalf in his name And in Seshamma v Chennappa, (2) the original Court dismissed the suit on the ground that the will relied upon was not genuine, and the lower Appellate Court on the ground that the suit was wrongly brought in the name of the plaintiffs as executors The High Court on second appeal, allowed an amendment by substituting the minor son as plaintiff with one of the original plaintiffs as next friend In the converse case where a plaintiff sued in his personal instead of his representative, capacity an order under this rule was made (3)

The principle of the section has been moreover, held to be of general application, and to apply analogically to a miscellaneous application also (4) In the case cited, an application to raise the attachment of a property was made by the Official Assignee of Bombay as an attorney of the Official Assignee of Madras, and he was, instead of the latter, wrongly described as the applicant, and Strachey, J, held that as the affidavit annexed to the application showed the real fact, the application was not to be dismissed but amended by the substitution of the correct name, and that the analogy of a plaint would, under this rule, support the amendment

"Doubtful"—So where it was doubtful whether a road contractor or the vestry ought to sue a tramway company which had injured the road the vestry was therefore added as a co plaintiff in a suit by the road contractor (5) In the under mentioned case the suit was filed by a benamidar Parsons J, said that he would hesitate before deciding that the suit was wrongly filed, but any defect there may have been was cured by the lower Court acting under this section (6)

"The right plaintiff"—The question as to who is the right plaintiff will depend on the circumstances of the case in which the question should arise, and on the substantive law applicable From a general point of view it has been explained already who may be a plaintiff Every person will be a right plaintiff in a suit if he could join as a plaintiff in that suit (7) If however, there has been a bona fide mistake the Court will rectify it So where a suit was brought by one X as the authorized manager of Y an amendment was made by striking out X and instituting Y his employers as plaintiffs in the case (8) A case of mis-description must be distinguished from that of non joinder (1) The rule has been said to be applicable where it is found that a plaintiff cannot get the full relief which he seeks without joining some other persons as co plaintiff (2) It may, however, be a question whether in some cases, at any rate, such a joinder should not be made under sub clause (2) Under this sub rule there may be substitution, with which the second sub rule does not deal, (3) or addition In the case of the first sub rule, the original plaintiff may be either a wrong plaintiff or a doubtful plaintiff The second sub rule deals with the case of a person who is a right plaintiff in the sense that he is a person who should sue though he may be a person who is unable to obtain relief unless others are joined as co plaintiffs with him The matter, however, is not one of practical importance unless it be correct, as has been held, (4) that a change of parties as plaintiffs under this sub rule does not give rise to such a question of limitation as arises under the second sub rule

"May"—The Court is not bound to add any person In a case (5) apparently under the section corresponding to the second sub rule, the Court overruled the defendant's objection as to the non joinder of certain co sharers of the plaintiff, but the lower Appellate Court decided it against the plaintiff It was contended, on second appeal before the High Court, that that Court was bound to do justice by adding them as parties The High Court observed however, that "if the plaintiff has insisted upon his right to bring an action in the absence of his co sharers, he must abide by the result, and that it is too late, at this stage of the case, for him to ask to be allowed an indulgence of which he did not avail himself when it was available"

"Mistake"—The mistake may be either of law or fact (6) Fry, J. (7) considered that the corresponding rule of the English law did not apply where the plaintiff did not admit his mistake and insisted on his rights, but that while the Court could not substitute one plaintiff for another, except by the first plaintiff's consent, and where he admits that he has commenced his action improperly, yet in a proper case the Court will add a plaintiff under the second sub rule Where a son sued for his share in the family inheritance to which his father, then alive, was entitled alleging that the father was insane, it was held that in the absence of anything to show that the father authorized the suit, the Court could not regard its being brought in his son's name and not in his own as a bona fide mistake such as could be corrected under in this case does not appear to be correct, for if the substituted or added plaintiff is a new plaintiff, then s 22 of the Limitation Act will equally apply in the case of the first as of the second sub rule This dictum has been recently doubted in Bhola Roy & Jugs Bahadur, 19 C L J 5 (1913)

this rule (1) An action through a boni fide mistake was commenced in the name of the wrong person as plaintiff and the case on a point of law was decided against him. The original plaintiff then moved to substitute another as plaintiff, which was done (2) There can be no boni fide mistake when the person asking to be substituted or added acquired his right to be a plaintiff since the institution of the suit and had no locus standi at the time of the institution (3) The mistake must be as to the plaintiff, because a mistake as to the defendant can be rectified only under the second sub rule (4)

“Necessary for the determination” —Under this rule it is essential that the order for substitution or addition should be necessary for the determination of the real matter in dispute (5) It contemplates, it has been said, only cases in which the necessity is of the joinder of a person as a plaintiff, and there can be no determination of the matter in dispute until such joinder—a case which chiefly arises in suits for the enforcement of or relating to joint rights by persons jointly entrusted as co contractors joint owners and co sharers of property, or as members of joint families or partners in business (6) The question who should be joined is part of the substantive law applicable to the case and is not therefore here considered (7)

the second sub rule It is no objection to the substitution or addition of another person that the suit will fail even if he is substituted or added, as the object of the provisions of the section is not that a party's case should be so framed as to succeed, but that it should be so framed that it can be adjudicated upon by the Court, whether in his favour or against him (1) The institution of a suit by a wrong party cannot operate to keep alive the rights of one who by his delay has brought himself within the provisions of the Limitation Act (2) It has therefore often been held that if the period of limitation has lapsed as regards the person added, the suit must be dismissed (3) Although this rule only applies where the action has been commenced through a bonâ fide mistake as to the plaintiff, yet as the former section and sect 32 of the former Code were both used together, the Court had full power under the combined rules to deal with all questions relating to the adding, striking out, or substitution of parties (4)

Consent—Reference to this has been struck out as it has been dealt with in the third sub rule No person is obliged to have his or her name added as plaintiff in a suit without his or her consent And the justice of the rule is obvious because the suit may be improperly brought; and if a party were made plaintiff without his consent, he might also be made liable to costs If other parties should be joined as plaintiff, and they refuse to be joined, the proper course is to make them defendants, so that they are all before the Court, and the latter may make what order it considers just as to costs (5)

"Upon such terms"—Amendment is an indulgence, and the applicant will generally have to bear costs The terms usually imposed are that, if the original plaintiff is found not to be entitled to maintain the action, he must pay the costs up to the time of the joinder or substitution, and that the plaintiff joined or substituted will be entitled only to such relief as he could have claimed if the action had commenced at the time of his joinder as plaintiff (6)

Origin and scope of sub-rule 2—This clause, which as well as clauses 3 and 5 corresponds with sect 32 of the last Code, is taken from r 11, O 16, of the English rules. The distinction between this clause and O I r 1, is that the latter refers to the action of the plaintiff at the time of the presentation of the plaint in joining defendants, whilst this rule refers to the action of the Court at a stage subsequent to the presentation of the plaint in adding a party either as plaintiff or defendant (1). It deals with joinder and not with substitution (2). It does not apparently apply to divorce proceedings, (3) but the provisions of sect 53 of Act I of 1891 (Land Acquisition) are sufficiently large to allow the adaptation of this section to matters before the Judge referred to him by the Collector (4). As to Revenue Courts, (5) see note. It was held under the Code of 1859 that the section should receive a very liberal construction, (6) and under the Code of 1882 that the section was wide enough to meet every case of defect of parties (7). The section is not exhaustive, and it was held in the case cited below, (8) that even if it did not apply, the Court had, in the circumstances of that case, which dealt with a public trust, an inherent power to add new parties. The effect of the amendment of the section is to bring it into greater conformity with the English rule (vide post). The last clause but two of sect 32 of the last Code is now incorporated in O I r 8. Where in a suit for the recovery of possession of property the plaintiff falsely denied the title of persons whom he had joined as defendants and asserted that an exchange by which he had transferred this property to the defendants had never been acted upon, but it was found that the exchange had in fact terminated his title and had been acted upon, and he could not sue the principal defendant, it was held that he had not made a bona fide mistake within the meaning of this rule (9).

Court—Upon the question whether the powers given by this rule are exercisable only by the Court of first instance, or both by it and a Court of Appeal, a distinction must be drawn between the case (A) where a person has been a party to the original suit, but is not a party to the appeal, and this may be (a) where the party to the original suit has died, or (b) has not been added a party to the appeal, and (B) where the person sought to be added has not been a party to the original suit.

Case (A) (a) is provided for by sect 107. When the person alleged by the appellant to be the legal representative of a deceased respondent had been put on the record under these provisions, the Madras High Court held that the Court might add under this section another person who claims on good prima facie grounds to be the representative of the deceased (10).

The power conferred by this rule, which should be liberally construed is necessarily very wide. It should, however, be exercised in a reasonable manner, (1) and the Courts ought to take care in its exercise. Thus, Markby, J., in the case cited, (2) said "To bring persons on to the record, whose interests are not identical with either plaintiff or defendant, necessarily complicates the proceedings, and greatly impedes the progress of the suit. This disadvantage very frequently outweighs the advantages arising from finality of litigation, which is, upon the whole, the best justification for bringing in fresh parties. This alone ought to make the Courts of first instance very careful in the exercise of the power granted by sect. 73 (now the present rule)." If embarrassment or inconvenience will be caused, the order will probably not be made (3).

It is not profitable, however, in a matter of discretion to attempt to formulate particular rules for its exercise. Addition has been refused, where it would have led to a great variation in the plaint (4). Generally, but not always, the Court will in the exercise of its discretion refuse to give leave to add a plaintiff when the result would be to introduce a new cause of action and subject to the rule enacted by clause 1, where the original plaintiff has no right of action, he cannot by amendment under this rule introduce a plaintiff in whom there is a right of action and so make an entirely new case (5). And generally, care should be taken that the nature of the suit is not changed (6). But it was held in the under-mentioned case that at an early stage a person may be added as a party, even though the addition may lead to an alteration in the nature of the proceedings. Thus in an action in personam against the owners of a vessel for damages caused by its collision the ship has been added as a defendant. The vessel had not been impleaded originally, as at the time of the institution of the suit it was submerged in the harbour. It was contended that it was not competent to engraft proceedings in personam upon proceedings in rem, but Farran, J., said "The later decisions afford no ground for the contention that at an early stage and in a proper case the initial proceedings cannot be amended so as to bring them into the form which they would have assumed in the first instance, but for the ship not being, or not being supposed to be amenable to the process of the Court" (7).

The exercise of discretion must, of course, be of a judicial character, but will, as in other cases, not be interfered with on appeal, unless it is manifestly unjudicial and wrong (1) It is independent of the restrictions imposed by law on the parties So the Court may make the Government a party, even though the notice required by the Code has not been given, the absence of the notice not affecting the power of the Court in any case (2) An application to strike out or change the parties on the record should not be made ex parte (3) And before a person is added as a party, unless he is in Court and cognizant of the proceedings, a notice may be issued asking him to show cause why he should not be so added, and the notice should show the grounds on which either of the parties applies to have him added (4) The defendant on record cannot object to the addition of any person as a defendant, even in a suit which has been instituted with special leave required on account of the accrual of only a part of the cause of action within the jurisdiction of the Court (5)

"At any stage," etc.—the rule has been here simplified The former section drew a distinction (6) between orders striking out and orders adding The former could be made only on or before the first hearing the latter at any time before the suit had actually terminated (7) (vide post) And, further, while orders of the first kind could only be made upon the application of the party, the latter orders might have been made at any time Both the English rule and the present section contain the words "at any stage of the proceedings" Under the last Code the words were "at any time," and under the Code of 1859 "at any hearing" Under the English rule it has been held that there is jurisdiction to allow amendment, even after final judgment, as long as anything remains to be done in the action, though it be only assessment of damages though whether or not the Court will exercise the jurisdiction will depend on the circumstances of each case (8) Under the Code of 1859 also, in Vakat Chand v Advocate General (9) parties were allowed to be added after a decree had been made whereby the suit was referred to the Commissioner's Office to have accounts taken and property sold But when the plaintiff, after his case had been gone into and some of his witnesses examined applied to have certain persons made co defendants the Court was held to have exercised its discretion properly in refusing to add them at that stage, even though "they were the parties from whom, if he got a decree, he would have to receive possession" (10) Under the Code of 1882 "though sect 31 limits the time during which the defendant may object as of right for want of parties, there is nothing in the Code to prevent his applying at any time to the Court to exercise its powers of adding persons who ought to have been joined, or to prevent the Court from exercising its power upon such an application" (1) An order allowing a co-widow, who was not a party to the suit, to be joined in execution proceedings as a joint decree holder was not set aside, as the Court (2) was not prepared to say that the Subordinate Judge had not a discretionary power at any stage of the suit. They observed, however, that the power was restricted to the cases in which joinder might be necessary for the adjudication of questions raised in the suit, and that in that case that period had passed, and that "it is unusual and inconvenient to allow a person, who might have applied before decree, to be joined as co plaintiff after decree even if it be lawful to do so, where no interest has devolved and no interest has been created since the institution of proceedings." In Tikam Singh v Thakur Kishore (3) the suit was for a sale of the property under the Transfer of Property Act, and defendant's minor brother and sons, who were members of a joint Hindu family, and interested in the property within the meaning of sect 85 of the Act, were added as co defendants, on an application by the plaintiff, presented even after a decree had been made against him, and set aside under sect 108 of the former Code, corresponding with O IX r 13 of this. If, however, it becomes necessary to enforce a judgment against persons who have acquired a title after it was made, this cannot be done by execution but an action must be brought for that purpose (4).

"Upon or without the application."—This is an application, if made, of either party, plaintiff or defendant. Though either party may apply, the result of such application may vary according as it is made by either the plaintiff or the defendant. Thus, a person may sometimes be made a co defendant on plaintiff's application but not on the defendant's (5). And, as a general rule, a person whose right to join as a plaintiff is denied by the plaintiff on the record should not be made a co plaintiff, though he may be made a defendant (6). The plaintiff is not bound to make the application, even in cases in which the Court will usually allow the addition of a person as a party. So while the Court will usually sanction the addition of assignees pendente lite, the plaintiff is not bound to implead them (7). A person may, however, be made a party without the application of either party and on his own application, (8) the Court acting itself on the information of a third party. The right to make the application contemplated arises with the necessity for making it (1). A person may however, be added as a defendant to an interpleader suit, even if the plaintiff does not recognize any right in the party who seeks to be added to share in the thing in respect of which the interpleader suit is brought (2).

In representative suits falling within O I r 8 of the Code, a person who is not a party on record is often made such on an application by himself, and, in fact, as O I r 8 states the course to be taken by any one of the class on behalf or against which a suit is brought, who desires to intervene is by applying to be made a defendant in person (3). There is a considerable difference between the position of a person who is made a defendant on his own application, and who is so made without any application of his. The former has to make out a prima facie case before the plaintiff can be asked to meet it, (4) but against the latter, the plaintiff has to prove his case, as against the original defendant, (5) whose position as regards the burden of proof is not altered by a person being made a co defendant on his own application (6). It was held that when the name of a person who had been made a party was struck out all the evidence produced by him ought to be excluded (7). The order giving leave to strike out a defendant should provide for his costs (8). If when a name is struck out the Court has not jurisdiction to try the case the plaint should be returned to be presented in the proper Court (9). In a suit (10) for possession of land between persons, each of whom claimed to be the lessee of it, and the lessors from whom they alleged having derived their right respectively had been made parties, it was held that that had been done unnecessarily as there was no cause of action against either of them and the Court ordered their names to be struck out. And where two persons in the same suit claim pre-emption in regard to the sale, but without having any joint right the name of one of them ought to be struck out (11).

in Mohindrobhoosun v Shosheebhoosun 5 C 882 (1880) that this section did not contemplate any application by the person desiring to be added, but the learned Judge (Wilson J) subsequently stated that he did not intend to lay down that a third party could not come in and apply. As to the exercise of powers under this section on appeal, vide ante, p 551, "Court"

The terms will be such as the Court thinks just under the particular circumstances of the case. So the Court has imposed the term that the person added as a defendant should consent to be bound by all the previous proceedings in the suit in the Court, and by any order that the Court might make as to the costs of those proceedings, (1) as without such consent the evidence already existing on the record could not be used against him (2). So also a party has been added who consented to be bound by the preliminary judgment which had already been passed, the Court directing that further proceedings were to be carried on against him in the same manner as if he had been an original defendant (3). An order has been made for adding a Bank as defendant on its undertaking, if the Court should so direct, to pay its own costs and those of the other party to the action, to enter appearance at once, to appear on motion for judgment next day, and to waive questions of form (4). And the Court has offered on the defendant's application to add a person as a co defendant against the wish of the plaintiff, if the defendant would indemnify plaintiff against his costs (5). A Court cannot of its own motion add a Receiver as a defendant, when the leave of the Court appointing the Receiver has not been obtained (6).

Striking out.—Further, no name could be struck out by the Court suo motu without an application from a party, nor at the trial, but only on or before the first hearing. Thus, where a suit was dismissed against one of the defendants some time after the issues were settled, the order was set aside as illegal (7). And the name of a person who had been added as a defendant after the first hearing could not be struck out in any case, even if a notice could not be served on him on account of the non discovery of his whereabouts (8). If persons improperly joined do not move to be struck out and take a part in the defence they may be held liable jointly with the other defendant for costs of the action (9). And where a defendant having put in a statement of defence applied to have his name struck out he was refused his costs, as he had not applied at the first possible moment (10).

This distinction between orders striking out and orders adding parties has been abolished and either class of order may now be made before, on, or after the first hearing at any time, and either upon the application of the party or of the Court's own motion. It will be observed that the words in the second paragraph of the former section "order that any plaintiff be made a defendant or that any defendant be made a plaintiff" do not now appear, but the same power to order this remains, as in such a case a Court would strike the party off the side of the suit in which he had been placed and re add him on the opposite side. Such a transposition is made frequently in, though not confined to, partnership suits (1). Thus, in Edulji Muncherji v Vulleebhoy, (2) the plaintiff wished to withdraw, and ten of the defendants supported his application, and on the application of two of the other defendants, the Court allowed them to be made plaintiffs, and the plaintiff to be made a defendant. A defendant who has assigned all his rights in the subject matter of the suit, and has no longer any interest in it, has no right to be made a co plaintiff (3).

"Ought to have been joined," "or whose presence may be necessary."—No provisions have been laid down in the Code as to the persons who ought to be joined, or whose presence may be necessary before the Court, and the question must be determined on general principles with reference to the object contemplated by the rule, which is "to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the suit." Other sections may, however, be considered to furnish a guide to the Court in the exercise of its discretion under this rule (4).

In the words of Lord Redesdale, "All persons materially interested in the subject ought generally to be parties to the suit, plaintiffs or defendants, however numerous they may be, so that the Court may be enabled to do complete justice by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested, and that the orders of the Court may be safely executed by those who are compelled to obey them, and future litigation may be prevented" (5). Lord Hardwicke observed that "the general rule is that you must have all parties before the Court who will be necessary to make the determination complete and to quiet the question" (6). Lord Lyndhurst, in Small v Attwood, (7) said that "the general rule is that all persons who are interested in the question must be parties to a suit instituted in a Court of Equity." A similar principle is expressed in Comyn's Digest, namely, "that all concerned in the demand ought to be made parties in Equity. Not all concerned in the subject matter, respecting which a thing is demanded, but all concerned in the very thing which is demanded in the matter petitioned for, in the prayer of the bill, or, in other words in the object of the suit." But a person who has no interest should not be added, but only those whose claims must necessarily be taken into consideration before deciding on the plaintiff's title (8).

been held not to authorize a plaintiff, who has no right to sue, to amend by joining as co plaintiff a person who has such right (1) The object is only to improve the position of the plaintiff on record, and not to allow the suit instituted by one person to be converted in a new suit by another proper person. The same view has been taken in this country, it being held that a person can be added as plaintiff only in a suit which, though partially defective, is to some extent properly instituted, and in which the original plaintiff has some title to sue (2) The Court should not add persons so as to introduce a right of action which previous thereto did not exist (3) The rule under the Code of 1859 also was the same, and it was often held that where the plaintiff had no right of action against the defendants, he could not amend his case by joining as parties to the suit other persons who had a right of action against them (4) In a suit by a purchaser of goods against the vendor for damages, on the ground that the bulk did not correspond with the sample, the persons who had agreed to sell the same to them cannot be made parties, as, though their presence would save great expense, and prevent further litigation, it could not be said to be necessary to an effectual and complete adjudication (5) In the case cited, Pontifex, J., observed that the first vendor might be made a party under r 18 of English O 16, but that had not been embodied in the Code, and that he was not at liberty to construe this section as giving the power under clause 18 of O XVI.

In accordance with the principles regulating the joinder of parties, it is a general rule that every person who has an interest in the subject of a suit may be added as a party. The interest must, however, be an existing one. Thus, in a suit by an adopted son against the widow for his father's property in her possession, it was held that a reversioner should not be made a co defendant, as he had no interest at the time in the property, and his interest being contingent upon the death of the widow, it was a question whether he would ever have any interest at all (6) But it is sufficient that the interest is in existence at the time of the addition, it not being necessary that the party added should have had a right at the time of the suit, or should have derived a right from an original plaintiff (7) There can thus be no ground for adding those persons as parties who, according to the original defendants, should be interested in a portion of the property claimed, if the plaintiff withdraws his claim to that portion as against them (8) It is on this principle that assignees pendente lite are in England, as well as in this country, generally added as parties (1) In a recent Privy Council decision where a party had been joined as co plaintiff, being, by virtue of an agreement with the other plaintiffs, a co owner in an undivided share of the property claimed by them, it was held that he could not maintain the suit after the other plaintiffs had compromised their claim, for he had no present existing interest (2) The necessity of the presence of persons other than the actual litigants on account of their interest in the subject of a suit generally arises in suits by or against co owners, including members of joint families, and specially in suits for partition (3) In suits against the karnatan by any member of the tarwad affecting the property or the rights of the tarwad, all the members of the tarwad must be parties actually or constructively (4) On a similar principle in suits for partition of any property all the co sharers must be parties (5) The same principles apply to a dissolution of partnership, and in case of the death of one of the partners, his representatives must be unpleaded as parties in a suit between the remaining partners for the taking of the accounts (6) In a suit by a benamidar the real owner or his assignee may be added (7) A mortgage bond was executed ostensibly in favour of R, but J was the real mortgagee. plaintiff or defendant (1) The rule expressly provides for the addition as parties, of persons "whose presence before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the suit" It has been held in some cases, that only those questions are deemed to be involved in the suit which arise between the original parties, and that where new questions will arise between them and any other person there is no justification for his joinder as a party (2) On the same principle, it has even been held that if in an appeal a respondent dies, and on the appellant's application the name of a person is entered on the record as the respondent's representative, another person claiming to be such representative in lieu of him cannot be impleaded as a party under this section and sect 107, as the question of representative title between the two persons is not a question involved in the suit (3) In the case first cited it was held that the questions referred to in the section must be questions between the plaintiff and the defendant, and not such as may arise between co plaintiffs and co defendants inter se In the second case the majority of the Full Bench held that a person who is not, in fact, the legal representative is not a person who ought to be joined, and that if the section applied it would be the duty of the Court to decide on the representative title Mahmood, J, dissented from the decision of the majority of the Court and held that the applicant had "shown a sufficient case to entitle her to be made a respondent without the condition precedent of any decision" as to her representative title to the deceased The same view had been taken by the Madras High Court, (4) in which Turner, C J, observed "that where there appears a substantial doubt whether the person indicated by the appellant is the representative of a deceased respondent or a representative for all purposes connected with the matters in litigation, and if a person other than the person indicated by the appellant lays claim to the representative character and on good prima facie grounds, and where if he be not allowed to join, the interests of the person entitled to the estate of the deceased may be prejudiced we consider the Court ought to proceed under sect 32 to make him a party to the appeal' The Madras High Court has in other cases also construed the expression under comment in a broad sense (5) Thus, (6) a person who claimed to be jointly interested with the plaintiff in a bond on which the suit was brought was held to have been rightly made a party, the Court observing that the acceptance of a construction of the words restricting them to questions between the parties to the suit would involve the addition of the words "between the parties to the suit," and that "there can be few, if any, questions which cannot be determined between the parties to the suit one way or the other, and of which the determination if they be material, will, as between the parties to the suit, not be final," and "on the other hand, the interpretation warranted by the terms would enable the Court to avoid conflicting decisions on the same question which would work injustice to a party to the suit, and finally and effectually to put an end to litigation respecting them" In a suit against the personal representatives of the obligor of a bond, who was also the manager of a mutt, it was contended that the bond debt had been incurred for the mutt, and the successor in the management was held to have been properly made defendant (1) The Calcutta High Court also took a broad view (2) of the expression in a case (3) in which certain lands belonging to a joint estate were held by one of the co sharers under a private arrangement and let out by him to patnidars, and on partition they were allotted to another co sharer, who, in a suit brought by him against the tenants for rent, impleaded the patnidars as defendants in order that the question of the tenants' liability might be decided in their presence, and the Court held "that they were properly made defendants in the suit and that the Courts were justified in trying the question of the right to receive the rent as between the plaintiffs and the patnidars ' and that ' the trial of that question was in truth necessary in order to ascertain whether the relationship of landlord and tenant between the plaintiff and the tenant defendants existed or not " The expression as used in the corresponding English rule also has received a broad but still a limited interpretation (4) Thus it was said that the term "involved" was somewhat elastic, and might be so construed as to include a great number of subsidiary or collateral rights but though it was difficult to define the meaning of it, there must be some reasonable limit (5) Esher, MR, said ' I can find no case which decides that we cannot construe the rule as enabling the Court under such circumstances to effectuate what was one of the great objects of the Judicature Acts, namely, that, where there is one subject matter out of which several disputes arise all parties may be brought before the Court, and all those disputes may be determined at the same time without the delay and expense of several actions and trials " (6)

Sub rule (4)—Defendant added, amendment of plaint—This rule, which corresponds with sect 33 of the last Code, is taken from O XVI r 13 of the Rules under the Judicature Act, but some confusion crept into the wording of that section in its modification with reference to the Indian law. The words "if previously filed" thus appeared to be unnecessary, and what was intended to be served on the new and the original defendant was evidently not only "an amended copy of the summons," but an amended copy of the plaint (4). The rule has now been amended so as to include service of a copy of the plaint. The rule does not contemplate that, upon the addition of defendants to a suit a cause of action different from that upon which the suit was founded, which may have occurred to the plaintiff against the added defendants, should be added to the claim. All that it requires is, that when a defendant is added the plaint should be amended in such manner as may be necessary, and that an amended copy of the summons and plaint be served on the defendants. The amendment there referred to is such amendment as is necessitated by the addition of a defendant, and not such an amendment as would add to or alter the nature of the suit as originally brought (5).

Sub rule (5)—"Subject to the provisions"—This clause formerly commenced with the words "All parties whose names are so added, etc" According to a strict construction of the section, these words referred to all the previous clauses of the section and therefore also to cases in which the Court had made a person a defendant of its own motion. The power of a Court to add a party and the duty of that Court to dismiss the suit as barred by limitation are two different questions, and a Court may under this section add a party necessary to a suit although it may be obliged by the Limitation Act to dismiss such suit after such party has been added (6). It had however been held (it is submitted erroneously) that no question of limitation could be raised by a defendant who has been added by order of Court after the period of limitation. But it has been held by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court that a Court acting under the second paragraph of sect 32 of the last Code is bound by the provisions of sect 22 of the Limitation Act (7). Sect 22 of the Limitation Act, which is the section generally applicable, does not apply where really new persons are not made defendants, but only the names of those already so are

"Shall be deemed to have begun"—It has been pointed out (3) that it is peculiar that this provision is different from that in sect 22 of the Indian Limitation Act, under which the suit is deemed to have been instituted in regard to a person when he is made a party. The effect of the law of limitation in regard to the joinder of defendants under the present section is, that if the period of limitation for a suit against the added defendant shall have expired before the service of summons, and the claim against the original defendant is such as cannot proceed without joining as defendant the person against whom the claim is barred, the entire claim will fail even as against the original defendant. Thus a pre-emption claim against one of the joint vendees will fail if the summons is not served on his co-vendee till after the expiry of the period of limitation for a suit for the claim (4) even though the delay in the service may not be due to the plaintiff. Where in a suit a person is added as a party defendant at the instance of the Court after the period of limitation sect 22 of the Limitation Act applies and bars the plaintiff's remedy as against the added defendant (5).

There is no reference in this section to the Indian Limitation Act in regard to persons joined as plaintiffs but sect 22 of the Act applies also to the case of joinder of a plaintiff where the joinder is under clause 2 as well as when it is under clause 1 (6).

Appeal—See sect 104 and O XLIII r 1 and notes thereto. The Code of 1882 gave an appeal from certain orders under sect 588 clause 2. All orders under sect 32 were not appealable but where there was no appeal the order might have been attacked under sect 591 of the former Code on appeal from the final decree (7). An order based on an erroneous construction of the section was held not subject to revision under sect 622 corresponding with sect 115 post (8). A party who had assented to an order could not of course complain of it in appeal (9). Where an order adding a defendant under this section was not appealed against and no objection was taken thereto in the memorandum of appeal an oral objection taken on appeal to such order was disallowed (10).

Under the present Code no direct appeal is given and the same rule as to revision will apply. The Code may, however, be objected to in the appeal from the final decree under sect 105, post

11. The Court may give the conduct of the suit to such person as it deems proper.

Conduct of suit.—This rule was originally part of sect 32 of the last Code which referred to conduct of suit by the plaintiff. The word "suit" does not ordinarily include defence, but, according to the English practice, the conduct of the defence also is often given to one of the defendants, as for instance when a surviving partner of a partnership was made a co defendant as one of the executors of a deceased partner, the conduct of the defence was given to the other executor on the ground that the interests of the surviving partner might conflict with those of the estate of the deceased partner (1). Apparently with a view to adopt that practice, the word "person" has been substituted for plaintiff.

12. (1) Where there are more plaintiffs than one, any one or more of them may be authorized by any other of them to appear, plead or act for such other in any proceeding; and in like manner, where there are more defendants than one, any one or more of them may be authorized by any other of them to appear, plead or act for such other in any proceeding.

(2) The authority shall be in writing signed by the party giving it and shall be filed in Court.

Appearance by one of several plaintiffs or defendants.—O III r 1 enacts that parties may appear and act themselves personally in all suits. The present rule provides for the actual representation of a party to a suit in the course of its progress by another party on the same side, and O III r 1 lastly enacts that a party may, unless the Court otherwise directs, be represented by a stranger to the suit, namely, by a professional adviser or by certain recognized agents specified in O III r 2, post. It was held under the corresponding section of the Code of 1859 (sect 115), that it was sufficient if the authority was in writing, and that no general power of attorney was necessary (2).

13. All objections on the ground of non-joinder or mis-joinder of parties shall be taken at the earliest possible opportunity and, in all cases where issues are settled, at or before such settlement, unless the ground of objection has subsequently arisen, and any such objection not so taken shall be deemed to have been waived.

"Objections"—The objection dealt with by this rule is one for joinder

or misjoinder of parties. It does not refer to objections on the ground of want of a cause of action or right of suit in the plaintiff, which may not be disclosed until the case has been proceeded with and evidence has been taken (1). In the case of objections with which the rule does deal, the question whether there is or is not a want of parties in any particular case will depend on the substantive law applicable to it. The rule of procedure does nothing more than provide that certain rules of substantive law can only be enforced or given effect to in a particular way or under particular limitations. So while sect. 45 of the Contract Act is a matter of substantive law, the rule includes an objection for want of a co promisee as a plaintiff, it being intended to be a restriction on the right or necessity, as the case may be, of joint promisors or promisees to sue or be sued together, just as other limitation and procedure rules are virtually restrictions on the exercise of rights which, but for them, would exist and be enforceable (2). O II r 7 enacts a similar rule as regards causes of action.

"At the earliest possible opportunity."—The necessity for this provision and that in O II r 7 is founded on the fact that if the objection is taken in time, the plaintiff may take steps to join the persons whose non-joinder may be objected to (3) or remedy the misjoinder of claims objected to. The first hearing of a suit may, however, be the earliest opportunity a defendant may have of raising the objection, which, if taken in the defendant's written statement, cannot be considered too late (4). But the grounds of objection must have existed before the first hearing, otherwise an objection could not have been made or waived. If it did not so exist an objection may be made after the first hearing at the earliest opportunity after it came into existence (5). The time now fixed is the settlement of issues. As pointed out in the first of the cases last cited, "cases might occur in which sect. 34 would not prevent the defendant from objecting to the want of a proper party even after the first hearing, viz where after the first hearing and before decree a co parcener or remainderman or reversioner is born, or where a woman (who is a party) is married to a man who is not a party to the suit. The objection did not exist at or before the first hearing and therefore could not have been made or waived by the defendant, and if he made it at the earliest opportunity after it came into existence, he would have satisfied the spirit of sect. 34." The section has been amended accordingly.

If the objection is admitted by the plaintiff, the Court should, in the case of parties, act under O I r 10 and not dismiss the suit (6) and the Court may, where it is possible, whether the defendant omits to object (1) or objects and the plaintiff refuses to admit the objection, exercise of its own motion the powers given by that rule. If the objection when taken is not admitted by the plaintiff, and he does not apply to amend, but maintains the correctness of the plaint, and the Court, without immediately deciding the point, tries the case, and at its conclusion finds that the objection is good on facts proved by the defendant, the suit must be dismissed (2).

“Waived.”—Where an objection as to misjoinder (3) or of non joinder (4) is not taken in the Court of first instance it will be disallowed in appeal, and the claim will be disposed of on the merits. In Dhirm Das v Shama Soondri (5) the plaintiff widow made an adoption pending the suit, but the son was not made a party, and on an objection being taken as to that before the Privy Council, Lord Campbell spoke of it as “a safe maxim for a Court of Appeal to be governed by, that an objection, which, if taken, might have been cured and which has not been taken in the Court below, shall not be taken in the Court of Appeal. And see now sect 99 which amends the former sect 578 so as to include cases of misjoinder. The former section concluded with the words “by the defendant.” It was pointed out (6) that these words showed that the section did not limit the right of the plaintiff to add parties at any stage of the proceedings. Thus, in the case cited it was said “Often a defendant may be indifferent to the absence of persons who ought to be parties, but it, nevertheless, may be most important for the plaintiff to add them in order that they may be bound by the decree in the cause. The plaintiff may not, until an advanced stage in a cause become aware that persons ought to be made parties who have not been so made. The defendant may be well aware that those ought to be made parties, but purposely lets the first hearing pass without objecting to their absence from the suit and thus, so far as he is concerned, waives the right to object. But his waiver of that objection would not affect the absent parties and a decree made in their absence would not bind them. Hence it is that although sect 34 limits the defendant's right to object, the second passage of sect 32 (corresponding with sect 29), leaves it open to the plaintiff ‘at any time’ before decree to obtain permission to make new parties.” The words have now been omitted as unnecessary.

Previous provisions.—The terms of sect 7 of the Code of 1853, and of sect 13 of the last Code so far as regards the first two paragraphs, did not vary materially. The former declared that 'every suit shall include the whole of the claim arising out of the cause of action" The last Code substitutes the words "which the plaintiff is entitled to make in respect of," (1) and the clause "but a plaintiff may relinquish any portion of his claim in order to bring the suit within the jurisdiction of any Court" were added The cases there fore decided under the Code of 1859 were in point (2) so far as these two paragraphs were concerned The last two paragraphs were, however, new, and were introduced to do away with the view taken under the Code of 1859, that the plaintiff, though prohibited from splitting his claim, was not bound to pursue all his remedies at once (3) This section in the Code of 1882 was therefore, in this respect, more comprehensive in that it provided that a person entitled to more remedies than one in respect of the same cause of action must combine all his remedies in the first suit, unless he obtained the leave of the Court to reserve some of his remedies for a subsequent suit (4) The present rules are in substantially the same terms as the corresponding sections in the last Code, with the exception of the omission in clause 3 of r 2 of the words "obtained before the first hearing," as to which, see post

The section enacts the general rule that "contestants are not allowed to split up a cause of action, even where they have an election of different remedies, into different actions, or to supplement an incomplete remedy they may have selected at the first by availing themselves subsequently of another" (5)

Principle and scope of the two rules—R 1 contains provisions of a positive and directory character as to the framing of the suit with a view to procure finality of decision (6) Where, however, it was argued that the phrase "the subjects in dispute" in the former section connoted the corpus or object matter of the claim, and that therefore all possible claims to the same should necessarily be offered for decision in the suit, the Madras High Court (7) said. "In our opinion the expression 'the subjects in dispute' signifies the general relation between the parties to the suit for the determination of which the suit is brought In other words, the object of sect 42 (now r 1) is to require the plaintiff to bring forward his whole case as to the matter of litigation on the question of right involved in the suit, and not to require him to unite all the causes of action which he may have against the defendant in respect of the corpus or object matter of the suit" In this respect, therefore, r 1 bears the same construction as r 2, in which there is nothing to warrant the inference that all causes of action ought to be included in the alternative, or otherwise, in one and the same suit (1) The penalty for non compliance with r 1 is provided for partly in r 2 and partly by Explanation IV to sect 11. The former provides that if the plaintiff omits to include a portion of the entire claim, which has arisen at the date of the suit, out of the cause of action on which the suit is based, he shall be precluded from suing again in respect of such portion, and the latter provides that the matter of every ground which the plaintiff might and ought to urge in support of the cause of action on which the suit is founded shall be deemed to be a matter directly and substantially in issue in the suit, and decided therein whether such ground was actually relied upon or not in the suit. In other words, r 2 requires that the whole claim which has arisen, at the date of the suit, out of the cause of action shall be included in the suit so as to avoid splitting of a claim or claims arising out of one and the same cause of action. And Explanation IV to sect 11 enjoins that every ground which could and ought to have been urged in support of the claim actually made in the suit, shall be deemed to have been adjudicated upon therein, whether it was actually urged or not (2). The rule embodied in r 2 does not operate to give the defendant a ground of exception to the first suit, but by prohibiting a second suit it indirectly compels the plaintiff to include his whole demand in the first suit (3) and is thus a complement to r 1. To illustrate the operation of r 2 over the second suit and not the first where the plaintiff claimed, by right of inheritance, for partition of one out of a number of villages left by his ancestor, and the lower Court dismissed the claim as untenable under the corresponding section of the Code of 1859, the Appellate Court held that though that section might operate as a bar to any future claim by plaintiff for partition of the remaining villages by right of inheritance it could not be taken to be a bar to the then present claim (4).

R 2, which provides against what is called the splitting of a cause of action, is founded on the maxim that no one shall be twice vexed for one and the same cause (5). It is directed against two evils the splitting of claims and the splitting of remedies in respect of one cause of action. If a man omits from his suit a portion of his claim he shall not afterwards sue in respect of it, if he omits one of his remedies he cannot afterwards pursue it (6). It has been said that there is no rule of procedure which is founded on better reason and good sense (7). At the same time it has been pointed out that while in order to effect the good object of preventing unnecessary litigation, suitors are deprived of rights to which they would otherwise be entitled under the general law, the Courts should be careful in carrying out these provisions to confine their scope and construction within certain recognized limits and principles so as not to take suitors unfairly by surprise and to do as little injustice as possible in individual cases (1) So far as regards the party sought to be barred, the principle is that where the cause of action is the same and the plaintiff has had an opportunity in the former suit of recovering and procuring what he seeks to recover in the second, the latter suit is barred (2) The distinction between this rule and that of res judicata is that whereas the latter rule prescribes that what has been decided or is deemed to have been decided cannot be raised again, the present rule prohibits that being put forward which should have been, but was not, offered for the Court's decision, and in respect of which in consequence of such omission no decision has been given The present rule depends entirely on the identity of the cause of action, the bar being created by the institution of the suit and not by the judgment (3) The bar exists not because the point has been decided but because it should and would have been decided if the plaintiff had put it forward

The plea under r 2, it has been held, (4) does not involve a question of jurisdiction, and no Court is bound to take it up proprio motu As it is introduced simply for the benefit of a defendant, to prevent him being harassed by numerous suits, he should expressly plead it before judgment, if he wishes to take advantage of it Further, where objection is taken to the suit the onus is on the defendant to show that the causes of action are identical and that the suit is therefore barred, (5) and he cannot in this, any more than in any other matter, plead his own wrong (6) question was whether the rule applied to the case. As to inconsistent contentions, see Gandy v Gandy, L R 30 Ch. D 57, where it was held that a party was not at liberty to retain the benefit of a decision given on the finding that his liability under a covenant continued, and at the same time to insist that his liability under it had determined.

Rent Act, (1) as also to suits under Act X of 1859, the principle on which it is based being one of general equity, (2) but not to suits under the Dekkan Agriculturists Relief Act, that Act having been amended so as to remove the bar created by this rule (3) The Act of a guardian binds a minor unless unreasonable or improper, and the rule is therefore a bar to a suit by a minor who has attained majority and whose guardian had previously relinquished a claim (4) The rule does not apply where there has been no adjudication and leave has been specially granted to bring a fresh suit (5)

"SUIT."—The word does not here apply to execution proceedings R 2 deals with the frame and initiatory stages of a suit, and is not applicable after judgment and after the rights of the parties have been decided by a decree, in which the cause of action has merged, to proceedings in execution any more than, for example, sect 44 of the last Code (or O II rr 1, 5 of this) would be applicable (6) The question as to the applicability of the principle embodied in the section might arise in two ways Firstly, where the decree gives reliefs of a different character, such as a decree for possession and a decree for costs There is nothing in the Code to prevent separate and successive applications for execution as regards each of them (7) Secondly relief of a single character may be given by a money decree for, say, Rs 1000 The Full Bench in the first mentioned case reserved its opinion whether in such a case the plaintiff would be entitled to split up the execution of the decree by successive applications to execute to the extent for instance of Rs 10 The rule has been held not to apply in a case where there were two suits, and where one being struck off on the objection of the defendant, the plaintiff applied and was allowed to amend his claim in the other suit (8) An application to file an award is in many respects analogous to a suit and therefore the privilege given to a plaintiff in a suit to abandon portion of the claim in order to bring the suit within the jurisdiction of the Court has been held to apply also to a case where the party comes in with an application to cause an arbitration award to be filed (9) As to whether a proceeding for revocation of probate is a suit or not, see case cited (10)

"Shall include"—Ordinarily a claim is expressly specified In some cases, however, the claim in the prior suit will be construed to include a claim which, though not specially stated, is naturally implied in it So a prior suit for redemption of land was held to have included the trees on the land, and the Court having failed to adjudicate upon the portion of the claim relating to the trees a fresh suit based on it was competent to the plaintiff (1) If a mortgagor in a suit for redemption of an usufructuary mortgage omits to claim surplus profits, a subsequent suit for the recovery of such profits is barred by this section (2) The omission in a prior suit against one of several joint promisors of a part of the cause of action is no bar under sect 43 of the last Code (now represented by this rule) to a subsequent suit against another joint promisor for the portion so omitted (3) A plaintiff who omits to sue for a portion of his claim, stating that he does not relinquish it but means to sue again for it, can gain nothing by such statement, but, on the other hand, neither can such a statement furnish a reason for holding the first suit to be barred (4) As regards a plaintiff's claim for relief, he must either include it or obtain the leave of the Court to omit it, if he does neither he is barred (5)

"The plaintiff"—It has been held that a defendant's claim to set off stands in the position of a claim by a plaintiff in a separate suit, and that he may in relation to his cross-claim, be rightly regarded as a plaintiff within the meaning of the section (6)

Conditions of applicability of the rule—The main conditions the existence of which is necessary for the applicability of the rule, and which are dealt with in detail hereafter, are (a) the existence of a cause of action in the prior suit, (b) which was known to the party, (c) and which the Court had jurisdiction to try, and (d) the identity of parties, and (e) of the cause of action, the meaning of which last mentioned term in connection with the subject is subsequently defined and exemplified by reference to cases of tort, contract, and of a miscellaneous character

(a) Existence of cause of action in prior suit presupposed—The first thing to be considered is whether the cause of action in the second suit is the same as in the first. If so, but not otherwise the second suit is barred in respect of any portion of the claim which was omitted from the first suit (7) Where there is an infringement of one right and one cause of action has arisen, the plaintiff must make his whole claim once for all in one suit. If the plaintiff had thus an opportunity in the former suit of recovering what he seeks in the second, the former suit is a bar to the latter action (8) But this rule, which requires the whole claim to be put forward, presupposes the existence of a cause of action and will have no application where it is found that the former suit had no cause of action. This will generally be the case when the former suit was dismissed as premature, in which case the claim may be put forward in a suit brought on the maturing of the cause of action (9)

There is no bar if the plaintiff had in fact no cause of action in respect of his claim at the date of the institution of the prior suit and so could not have sued or properly sued, (1) and where nothing is decided but that should he sue again (2) In short, only the claim which the plaintiff is able to make must be put forward, and only so much of the claim is required to be included as the plaintiff may be able to make at the time of institution of the suit (3) If, further, a person has a claim by reason of the defendant's default, but is entitled to waive it and does so, he is not precluded by such waiver from enforcing his claim in the case of a subsequent default, the cause of action not being the same (4)

(b) Which was known to the party.—An omission to sue can only be a bar when the claim was known at the date of the institution of the first suit. A right which a litigant possesses without knowing or ever having known that he possesses it can hardly be regarded as a "portion of his claim" within the meaning of the section (5). A person cannot, moreover, omit or relinquish that of which he has no knowledge. The provision as to omitting a claim clearly involves the idea that the plaintiff so omitting was, at some time prior to the suit, aware or informed of the claim or aware of the facts which would give him a cause of action (1) It has also been held that where the facts have been fraudulently concealed, the fraud gives a new cause of action on which the second suit may be brought (2) Where, however, a person knows of the facts before the institution of the suit and omits to make a particular claim by an oversight, it is no answer to say that such omission was due to mere mistake, and was not actuated by any fraudulent or dishonest motive. If the words of a law are clear and positive, they cannot be contested by any consideration of the motives of the party to whom it is to be applied, nor limited by what the Judges who apply it may suppose to have been the reasons for enacting it (3) Nor, where the plaintiff is aware of his cause of action, is it necessary that the amount of damages resulting therefrom should be known or even be capable of being known. So it is a general principle in cases of breach of contract or tort, that where there is but one cause of action damages must be assessed once for all (4) In some cases of wrong the cause of suit is not complete until actual damage has ensued, but when once the cause of suit is matured, the subsequent occurrence of further damage, whether after or before this has been adjudicated upon, does not originate a fresh cause of suit, were it otherwise, litigation might have no end, for in few cases does the damage flowing from a wrong or breach of contract cease with one event (5) Therefore, as regards damage actually incurred, all must be claimed, and as regards those which have not actually accrued at date of suit, that future or prospective damage, though not known may be estimated, and are therefore, in contemplation of law deemed to be known, and must be claimed for once for all (6)

(c) And which the Court had jurisdiction to try.—It is obvious that a plaintiff is not debarred from having a matter tried in a second suit if by reason of the absence of necessary jurisdiction it could not be heard in the first. He is entitled to have his claim adjudicated. All that the section says is that if he had an opportunity of having it adjudicated, which he neglected to avail himself of, he cannot sue again. A reasonable construction must be put upon the section, and the words "whole" claim must be understood with the qualification, "in so far as it is cognizable by the Court in which the suit can be lawfully entertained" (1). It was intended to prohibit a second suit when the whole claim arising out of the cause of action was within the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court in which the plaintiff had brought his first suit, or such suit had been made cognizable by the Court in point of pecuniary value by the relinquishment of a portion of the plaintiff's claim under the express provision in the same section (2). If the first Court had, in fact, no jurisdiction in respect of the claim, or any portion of it, the plaintiff need not, and indeed could not, have sued. If, in the same circumstances, and in the belief that a Court has jurisdiction, a party does sue, he cannot be said to relinquish or omit a claim which is put forward, even though erroneously. If, therefore, as in the first case next mentioned, a party sues and obtains a decree which is infructuous for want of jurisdiction, or, as in the second case, he is refused a decree, he is not precluded from suing again. Where the cause of action was not split because the plaintiff did not in the first case either relinquish or omit to sue for any portion of his claim, and the necessity for the second suit arose out of the fact that the decree in the first suit was infructuous so far as regarded a certain portion of the property, in consequence of its having been made without jurisdiction the section was held not to apply (3). And where a plaintiff had a right to sue his mortgagor for the mortgage debt in the Court within whose jurisdiction the mortgagor resided, the fact that he erroneously claimed in that suit relief against the lands which that Court had no jurisdiction to give, and therefore refused, did not bar a subsequent suit in the proper Court to enforce the mortgage by sale of the mortgaged property (4). The principle has been held to apply even where the jurisdiction might have existed with a permission which was never applied for. So where at the date of the former suit the land in respect of which the subsequent suit was brought was subject to provisions which deprived the Courts of jurisdiction except where authority was given by Government to entertain a particular suit it was held not obligatory on a plaintiff to obtain the permission of Government. The latter was not bound to give the Courts jurisdiction, and might possibly refuse it, or might give it after such a lapse of time as would be a bar to a party proceeding with the rest of his claim. Innes, J. said: "If at the time of a cause of action so arising to a plaintiff, or in the interval between that and a subsequent date, any part of his claim is not cognizable by the Court, it cannot I think be intended that he must postpone his suit for the cognizable portion of his claim until the Court acquires jurisdiction over the portion at present uncognizable."

or be barred of all future remedy for the recovery of that portion" (1) Under the Code of 1859, where property was in two districts, it was necessary to apply to the High Court under sect 12 of that Code for sanction of the trial. It was held in some cases that a plaintiff was not bound to include all such properties in one suit, and to apply for sanction, and that he might sue separately in each district (2) The Calcutta High Court, however, held that a plaintiff should include all properties and apply for sanction (3) Sanction, however, is no longer necessary for the exercise of jurisdiction over the whole property by a Court in which any portion of it is situate, and the plaintiff has now an absolute right to sue for the whole of the property situate in several districts, in any one of such districts. A suit, therefore, for partition must include the property in all the districts, and a suit for partition of property in any one district will not be allowed (4) The principle applies to defect of material as of local jurisdiction. The former Court must have had jurisdiction to try the particular question raised in the second suit. Where the former suit was instituted in the Revenue Court, a subsequent suit in the Civil Court is not barred in respect of a matter not triable by the Revenue Court (5)

(d) Parties must be the same—Not merely must both suits arise out of the same cause of action, but they must be between the same parties, or between parties under whom they, or any of them, claim (6) This rule bars a second suit only when the plaintiff in that suit was also the plaintiff in the first (7) But if a person would have been barred, so will a person claiming through him as heir, (8) or assignee. And as a plaintiff having an entire demand cannot divide it into distinct parts, and maintain separate actions upon each by parity of reason he cannot by an assignment enable others to do it (9) In the under-mentioned case (10) it was held that the Advocate General as plaintiff in that suit was barred by a decree in a previous suit under this section. The trustees in that suit, having then omitted to ask for an account, could not sue again. The Advocate General represented the same interests as they did, and was therefore equally bound. It was, however, held that even if that were not the case the Court, in the exercise of its discretion, would not direct the account asked for. As regards defendants, however, it is to be observed that this rule has reference to the subject matter of the claim, and not to the persons against whom it may be made (1) It occurs in an Order which relates to the frame of a suit, and not to the array of parties. It lays down no rule as to who is to be impleaded as a defendant, and does no more than provide that the plaintiff must include, in the relief he asks for in his plaint, the whole claim he is entitled to make in respect of his cause of action against the defendant. It nowhere prescribes that where one person has two distinct causes of action, different in their nature and in their incidents, respecting the same property, one against one person, and one against another, he is bound to join those causes of action in one suit (2) Not only must the plaintiff be the same, but the bar applies only to a suit against the same defendant (3) This rule does not affect that which lays down the principle of bar for jointness. The principle of the maxim, Nemo debet bis vexari, applies not only to the case of one individual being sued twice for the same cause of action, but also to the case of a person suing twice on the same contract (4) The rule that a decision against a joint, not joint and several, contractor, or a joint tortfeasor, is a bar to a suit against another contractor or tortfeasor, while proceeding also on the ground of unity of cause of action, is based on a different principle, viz. merger of the right of action in a judgment (5)

(c) And there must be identity of the cause of action.—In order that the action should be a bar, the cause of action must be the same in both suits, both claim and remedy have reference to the same cause of action. The rule has no application where the causes are distinct. The rule does not compel a plaintiff, who has several causes of action, to lump them together under the penalty of having a subsequent suit barred. It applies only where there has been a splitting of a single cause of action. As pointed out by the Privy Council the "section does not say that every suit shall include every cause of action, or every claim which the party has, but every

In Ramayya v Venkataratnam, 17 M. 122, 128 (1893) the section was held not to apply as the defendants were born subsequent to the former suit, and cf. Ganpat Rai v Hira

Singh, 1891, P. R. No. 29, Balmakund v Sangari, supra. And in Madud v Jalum, 4 N. W. P. H. C. R. 142 (1872) Pearson, J., dissenting (in this respect, it is submitted, rightly) held that the section did not apply and said that the direction that "every suit shall include etc." is to be understood in respect of the defendants impleaded in that suit, but see also Murti v Bhola Ram 16 A. at p. 173 (1893)

(5) See the subject which is foreign to the section, treated in Hukm Chand, Res. Jud. 734 C. P. C. 551 and the leading decision of Kendall v Hamilton 4 App. Cas. 504, which has been referred to in numerous cases in this country which will be found in the text books cited suit shall include the whole of the claim arising out of the cause of action, meaning the cause of action for which the suit is brought" (1) It has also been held, in the under mentioned case, (2) that a plaintiff was not bound to alter the nature of his suit upon the addition, at their own instance, of certain persons as defendants. In this case a suit had been brought by A for the recovery of certain moveable property. Two persons were in possession of a house, which, as well as the moveable property, had originally belonged to the same person. They were, on their own application, added as defendants. In a subsequent suit by A's son to recover the house, it was held that his father was not bound to set up a claim to the house in the first suit against the added defendants. To have done so would have been to alter the nature of the suit as originally brought, and to have offended against the provisions of sect 44 of the last Code and O II rr 4, 5 of this.

As in the case of res judicata, the claims in the two suits must have been made under the same title. The plaintiff must not only be the same person, but he must be suing in the same right. Thus, a suit for damages, under Lord Campbell's Act (corresponding to Indian Act XIII of 1855), is no bar to a suit for damages suffered by the personal estate and effects of the deceased, inasmuch as the action under the Act is not connected with the estate of the deceased, and the damages recovered form no part of that estate, whereas the second action is brought by the executor or administrator as representing the estate of the testator or intestate (3).

In order to determine whether in any case the causes of action in the two suits are the same, it is necessary to determine what was the cause of action in the former suit, and this cause of action, it has been held, must be sought for between the four corners of the plaint (1) The Court has not to see how the facts stood upon the finding of the Court in the first suit The question to be determined turns not upon what was the proper suit for the plaintiff to have brought, or the proper remedies for him to have applied for, having regard to the facts as found upon the trial of the first suit, but upon whether the causes of action alleged in the plaints in the two suits are one and the same, or are distinct (2) The cause of action as alleged in the plaint cannot be altered by the result of the suit (3) So where a suit for confirmation of possession is dismissed upon the ground that the plaintiff is not in possession, such suit is no bar to another for recovery of possession (4) And in the under-mentioned case (5) it was held that there was nothing in the former section which would justify the Court in going behind two bonds to consider the circumstances out of which they sprang, albeit those circumstances might themselves at the time constitute a cause of action

Meaning of "cause of action"—The meaning of the term "cause of action" has been discussed in the notes to sect 20 and O I r 1, ante The question of the identity of the cause of action in the two suits will depend considerably on the circumstance whether, in cases other than those in which the cause consists merely of a right, the term is used in its restricted sense of the infringement of a right, or in the wider sense both of the right and its infringement The wider the meaning which is attached to the term 'cause of action,' the more restricted is the operation of the section, for if the term is composed of only one element, there is more likelihood of the identity of the two suits than where their identity is required in all of several elements The term has, in connection with this section, been defined in a number of cases in its wider sense, (6) though there are others in which the term appears to have

It was said of the last Code that the term "cause of action" had not been used in all its sections in precisely the same sense (2) It is to be construed with reference rather to the substance than to the form of action (3) The test has been said to be whether the same evidence and arguments apply in the two cases (4)

The cause of action must be distinguished from the subject matter (5) of the suit, as well as from the relief (6) claimed The words have no relation whatever to the defence, but refer to the grounds set forth in the plaint (7)

(7) Dampuboyina : Adilala, 25 M 736, 739 (1902), in which also, at pp 745-747, the distinction between 'cause of action' and 'same matter, in s 26 of the former Code, is pointed out

If the causes of action in two suits are separate, the fact that the suit which might have preceded in point of time has actually been posterior does not affect the question (1) Nor does the fact that joinder of claims might be made without being open to the charge of multifariousness take away the plaintiff's right to bring separate suits in respect of separate causes of action. Because a plaintiff has not formerly availed himself of the right to join separate claims when that is permissible, that is no objection under this section to a subsequent suit (3)

Prior valid causes of action cannot be made into one by a transaction which is inoperative in law and challenged as such in the suit. So a suit to cancel a release, obtained by duress of all claims against defendants, and to recover the amount of one such claim was held to be no bar to subsequent suits upon other causes of action so released (3). The same rule applies if a document is inadmissible in evidence and, in consequence, a party sues on the original transaction prior to such document. So where a balance was found due between the parties, and a promissory note was executed providing for its payment by instalments, and the note being inadmissible for want of stamp, the plaintiff had to sue on the original transaction, he was held to be bound to sue for the full amount, and a suit for the amount due for some of the instalments provided for in the note was held to bar a subsequent suit for the balance (4)

The duty to obey a foreign judgment is a new and separate cause of action from that of the original cause of action to which the judgment gave effect (5)

Each right which gives a right of action as also, as a general rule, distinct acts, constitute separate causes of action (6). So as regards separate rights, a cause of action in respect of injury to a proprietary or permanent interest in an estate is not the same as that in respect of injury to a temporary or leasehold interest, (7) and the cause of action accruing to a co sharer by reason of exclusion from joint possession is not the same as that which he possesses to have the joint estate partitioned, (8) nor is the cause of action the same in a

So the fact that a prior mortgagee might have been but was not impleaded did not bring the case within the section. Balmakund v. Sangari, 10 A at p 388 (1897).
